On amendments 133 and 138: Strikes out the provision requiring the various charitable institutions to report to the commissioners as to their receipts and expenditures and with reference to the estimates for such institutions, and proposes as a substitute therefor the following provision:

"That for the purpose of securing a more equitable and efficient expenditure of the several sums appropriated for charities there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as soon as may be after the passage of this act, some thoroughly experienced and otherwise suitable person not a resident of the District of Columbia, to be designated Superintendent of Charities for the District of Columbia, whose duty it shall be to formulate for the purposes of the expenditures for charities in said District such a system or plan of organized charities for said District as will by means of consolidation, combination or other direction, in his judgment, best secure the objects contemplated by the several institutions and associations for which such appropriations are made, and for the other charitable work of the District, with the least interference each with the other, or misapplication of effort or expenditure, and without duplication of charitable work or expenditure; and all such appropriations shall be expended for the purposes indicated, under the general direction of said superintendent and in conformity, as near as may be, with such system or plan, subject to the approval of the board of commissioners of the District of Columbia. And it shall also be the duty of said superintendent to examine into the character of the administration of said institutions and associations, and the condition, sufficiency, and needs of the buildings occupied for such charitable purposes, and also to ascertain in each case the amount contributed from private sources for support and construction, the number of paid employees, and the number of inmates received and benefited by the sums appropriated by Congress, and to recommend such changes and modifications therein as in his judgment will best secure economy, efficiency, and the highest attainable results in the administration of charities in the District of Columbia. And said superintendent shall from time to time report in detail to the commissioners of the District, who shall communicate the same with their estimates for appropriations to the then next session of Congress, his doings hereunder, together with such estimates and recommendations for the future as in his judgment will best promote the charitable work of the District. Said superintendent shall be entitled to a compensation at the rate of $3,000 a year, which sum is hereby appropriated for this purpose for the fiscal year 1891. And all estimates submitted hereunder shall be included in the regular annual Book of Estimates."

On amendments 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, and 139, relating to the Washington Asylum: Appropriates $20,000 as proposed by the House instead of $25,000 as proposed by the Senate for raising the magazine building two stories; appropriates $550 for a new roof for the male work-house and $4,200 for a new ward; strikes out appropriation proposed by the Senate of $2,200 for inclosing the grounds with a board fence; and provides that all that portion of reservation 13 east of Nineteenth street, east, and south of B street, south, be transferred to the control of the commissioners as an addition to the present burial grounds of the Washington Asylum.

On amendment 140: Appropriates $500 for painting the buildings of the reform school.

On amendments 141 and 142: Increases the amount for temporary support of indigent persons from $5,000 to $5,400, including $400 for the Washington Night Lodging House Association.

On amendments 143 and 144: Appropriates $10,000 for the National Association for Destitute Colored Women and Children, and $2,000 additional for the care of colored foundlings, instead of $3,000 as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment 145: Increases the amount for the Children's Hospital from $7,000, as proposed by the House, to $10,000.

On amendment 146: Increases the amount for St. Ann's Infant Asylum from $5,000, as proposed by the House, to $5,500, instead of $7,500 as proposed by the Senate.

On amendments 147 and 148: Appropriates $6,000 for the German Orphan Asylum without condition, instead of $5,000, as proposed by the House conditional that the asylum furnish a like amount, and $10,000 as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment 149: Appropriates $1,500 for the Church Orphanage Association, instead of $2,000 as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment 150: Appropriates $3,042 for the Association for Works of Mercy, instead of $2,500 as proposed by the House and $3,542 as proposed by the Senate.

On amendments 151 and 152: Appropriates $12,000 for the National Homoeopathic Hospital Association, instead of $5,000 as proposed by the House.

On amendment 153: Appropriates $2,500 for St. Rose Industrial School.

On amendment 154: Appropriates $3,000 for House of the Good Shepherd.

On amendments 155 and 156: Strikes out proposed appropriation of $1,000 for the Little Sisters of the Poor and $2,000 for the Home for Incurables as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment 157: Appropriates $30,000 for the erection and completion of a building for the Central Dispensary and Emergency Hospital, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendments 159, 160, 161, and 162, relating to the water department: Fixes the appropriations therefor as passed by the Senate, providing specifically for the salaries of all the employees of the department, and also reduces the amount for the general expenses of the water department from $96,000, as proposed by the House, to $62,000, and reappropriates the unexpended balance of the appropriations for the current fiscal year for the service of the next fiscal year.

On amendment 163: Strikes out section 2, as proposed by the Senate, authorizing the amounts chargeable to the District on account of the establishment of the Zoological Park, and the amounts on account of the water supply provided for by the deficiency appropriation act of March 2, 1889, to be paid respectively in twenty-five equal annual installments, with interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum.

On amendment 164: Changes the numbering of a section.

On amendment 165: In lieu of the provision inserted by the Senate, authorizing any street-railroad company in the District now authorized to run cars drawn by horses, which shall change its motive power on any of its lines to cable or electricity in accordance with the provisions of law, to have the right to issue stock for the amount equal to the cost of making such change, inserts the following:

"SEC. 3. That any street-railroad company in the District of Columbia authorized to run cars drawn by horses, which has changed or may change its motive power on any of its lines now constructed to cable or electricity, or changes its rails in accordance with the provisions of law, shall have the right to issue and sell, at the market price thereof, stock of said company to an amount necessary to cover the cost of making said changes, and the amount of said stock sold together with the price per share be fully set forth under the oath of the president of said company and filed with the commissioners of the District. And any company availing itself of the privilege herein granted shall, within two years, wholly dispense with horses as motive power on all portions of its line and substitute therefor the power provided for in the act making appropriations for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia, approved March 2, 1889, or pneumatic or other modern motive power which shall be approved by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, but nothing in this act contained shall in any wise authorize the use of overhead appliances: Provided, That if any such company operating a line or lines of street railroad from Georgetown or West Washington to and beyond the Capitol grounds shall fail to substitute for horse power the power herein provided for on all of its lines within two years from the date of this act, such company shall forfeit its corporate franchises."

The bill as it passed the House appropriated $5,332,931.15, including the appropriations for the water department, to which the Senate added by amendments $732,810, of which amount it was agreed by the conference committee that the Senate recede from $316,300, the House yielding $436,510.

The total appropriated by the bill as agreed upon in conference is $5,769,444.15, of which sum $233,407.18 is payable from the revenues of the water department, and the remainder, $5,536,036.97, is payable from the revenues of the District of Columbia and out of the Treasury of the United States, the one half of which sum being $2,768,018.48.

LOUIS E. MCCOMAS,

D. B. HENDERSON,

J. C. CLEMENTS,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Mr. Speaker, the House has been so fully informed by the reading of the report and the statement, to which they have listened so patiently, that, unless to answer any inquiry that may be put, I will not occupy the floor longer, but will yield to my colleague on the conference committee, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CLEMENTS], as much time as he desires.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Mr. Speaker, I shall take but a few moments of the time of the House, inasmuch as I was not present when this bill was passed, having been compelled to absent myself by reason of sickness. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS] in charge of the bill entered at that time into a comparison between the expenditures recommended by the bill as reported to the House and former expenditures on behalf of the District of Columbia. I will not read his remarks in full, but he closed with this statement:

The increase for 1890 over 1889 is more than 9 per cent. in a Democratic House, while upon the pending bill for 1891, in a Republican House, the increase over 1889 is only a little over 8 per cent., less than the annual increase of all the Democratic bills during five years.

In view of the fact that when this bill came back from the Senate it came with an increase of $762,810 by way of amendments, a portion of which was for increases of salaries and for salaries of new officers proposed to be created by the Senate amendments, I supposed that the gentleman from Maryland would revise his comparative statement. He has doubtless found by this time, from experience, that there is no small difficulty in contending with the demands of the Senate for increased expenditures, including increased salaries and new offices.

The gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. CANNON], in the early part of this session made some comparisons (as he is accustomed to do) between the appropriations of this and of former Congresses, and, as he will probably make further comparisons later in the session, I want to call his attention now to certain facts and ask him to make a memorandum of them so that when he comes to make his later comparisons he may not forget to mention them. On April 2, in connection with an appropriation bill then pending, he spoke of the increase of salaries and increase of offices, and made a comparative statement between that bill and prior bills passed in Democratic Houses.

He spoke of the time when the Democratic voices were strong in the control of these expenditures; and when I called his attention to the fact that a number of these increases were proposed in a Republican Senate and finally consented to reluctantly and under necessity at this end of the Capitol in order that the bills might be passed and the Government have the money with which to run its machinery, he said it was true that some of these matters were proposed in the Senate; but at the same time the tenor of his argument was to hold the Democrats responsible for these increases.

The Senate amendments on this bill when it first came back to us carried quite a number of new offices proposed by those amendments, as well as increases of salary. I am glad to say that the conferees of the two Houses acting together have been able to report this agreement eliminating some of these increases of salary and new offices. But there is a provision here increasing the salaries of school teachers in this District an average of $5 each.

Mr. SAYERS. How many teachers?

Mr. CLEMENTS. Seven hundred and ninety-five. So that my friend from Illinois may make a note of the fact that there are seven hundred and ninety-five increases of salary carried in this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. What does the increase amount to?

Mr. CANNON. About $3,500 in the aggregate.

Mr. CLEMENTS. About $1,000 annually.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him just a moment?

Mr. CLEMENTS. I will.

Mr. SAYERS. I believe the gentleman from Illinois, in his celebrated speech in the last Congress, included an increase of $5 a year to teachers; so that we are even.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Yes; the gentleman from Illinois, in making his comparative statement, included all the teachers whose salaries had been increased by the last Congress $10 each, but he treated very lightly the fact that that increase, like this, was proposed at the other end of the Capitol by a Republican Senate, and in that case, as in this, our conferees were not able to get the Senate to recede from the proposition, so that we had at last to agree to the increase. And now we have it repeated on this bill.

Mr. GEAR. What is the average of salaries paid to school teachers here?

Mr. CLEMENTS. The average now paid under existing law is $680.

Mr. GEAR. This makes an increase of $5 each.

Mr. CLEMENTS. This increases them so that the average will be $685.

Mr. GEAR. That is not above the average of salaries paid by many of the States, I believe.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. It is a good deal above the average in our State.

Mr. CLEMENTS. The gentleman from Illinois, in his comparative statement, included also several hundred Indians employed under the Interior Department on reservations, whose salaries I believe had been increased $2 apiece annually.

Mr. SAYERS. Can you give the exact number?

Mr. CLEMENTS. I do not know the exact number; but there were several hundred of them.

Mr. DOCKERY. When was that comparison made?

Mr. CLEMENTS. Last April.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is what I thought. During this Congress?

Mr. CLEMENTS. Yes, sir. I simply call attention to these facts now so that gentlemen on both sides may understand that this bill as agreed upon by the conference committee carries 795 increases of salaries for school teachers of the District; that this is done upon Senate amendments by a Republican Senate, and, if it is agreed to here, by a Republican House.

Mr. DOCKERY. The explanation that the gentleman from Illinois gave, I believe, when he made that comparison was that these increases came from Democratic Senators at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I think he stated something of that sort.

Mr. DOCKERY. Are they Republican or Democratic Senators who have proposed these increases?

Mr. CLEMENTS. I do not know by whom this particular amendment was proposed in the Senate, but I think it came from the Committee on Appropriations in that body.

Mr. DOCKERY. The Senate is Republican, however.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Certainly; and a majority of the conferees on the part of the Senate and the House are Republicans.

There is further in this bill an increase of the number of policemen—thirty-two in all—fifteen privates at $900 each, fifteen at $1,050 each, and two sergeants at $1,140 each. In addition to that, the office of superintendent of charities is created at a salary of $3,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is this officer under the control of the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. CLEMENTS. The Secretary of the Interior has nothing to do with the matter now. This new officer is a superintendent of charities of this District. The purpose of this office is, I think, a good one. It is to harmonize the objects of charity in this District for which appropriations are asked each year. There seems at present an overlapping. One institution is doing the same work that is done by another. Congress is called upon each year to appropriate money in aid of these charitable institutions, homes for the poor, etc., and we have to proceed almost in the dark for want of proper information.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe there is some legislation giving the Interior Department some supervision over these charities; and if the existing law on that subject is not sufficiently broad, why would it not be well to put all the charities distinctly under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, rather than create this new office, which, of course, will rapidly grow into a bureau?

Mr. CLEMENTS. Well, that, Mr. Speaker, is an entirely new proposition. I am not aware of the fact that many of these institutions are under such control or supervision.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would suggest to the gentleman as an illustration the Deaf and Dumb Institution and the Insane Asylum.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Yes, of course, those that belong to the Government are. But these institutions have been established by charitable bequests, or on the part of charitable people, and have been maintained heretofore in large part by charitable contributions from the people.

But annually there is an increasing demand on Congress to appropriate in aid of them. The annual appropriations in support of such institutions are growing from year to year—the institutions themselves not being public, but private in their character—and we are constantly put in the attitude of denying altogether this relief in aid of such institutions or else we are appropriating the money absolutely in the dark. We have no knowledge of its expenditure after it leaves our control. For instance, there is embodied in this bill something over $100,000 in aid of these different institutions. There ought to be some method devised by which the Congress can act advisedly in such matters, in the light of the expenditure of the money thus appropriated.

The practice now is simply to pay the money over to the management of the institution, and Congress has no further knowledge of what disposition is made of it; no returns are made; there is no scrutiny on the part of Congress as to their management, and hence I say it is an appropriation in the dark. I believe proper supervision would promote economy and efficiency.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me ask the gentleman from Georgia whether or not this provision places all of the charitable institutions of the District under this general supervision.

Mr. CLEMENTS. It places all of them for which appropriations are made by Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. Including the Deaf and Dumb Asylum and the Institution for the Insane across the river?

Mr. CLEMENTS. It would not, I think, take away the supervision of the Interior Department over them.

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, if it be desirable to organize this new movement, why not embrace the whole subject of charities in this District under one head?

Mr. CLEMENTS. That is a proposition worthy of consideration. I have not here discussed and I am not prepared to say what is best to be done. I have simply called the attention of the House to the increase of offices and wanted to show that this particular one I have not objected to and do not now disapprove. I did not believe that this increase of salary of the seven hundred and ninety-five school-teachers was necessary or justifiable and do not now believe it, and I have not voted for it, but against it.

Mr. SAYERS. Can the gentleman from Georgia tell us what increase of offices and employes the bill bore when it passed the House?

Mr. CLEMENTS. It did not carry any new offices of any consequence, I think.

Mr. SAYERS. How many did it carry?

Mr. CLEMENTS. A very small number.

Mr. McCOMAS. I think probably there were no increases.

Mr. SAYERS. I think the gentleman will find on examination that there were some forty or fifty of them.

Mr. CLEMENTS. What were they?

Mr. SAYERS. Employes of the District.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I do not know anything of that. The increases we are dealing with now have been put on entirely in the Senate, and having called the attention of my friends from Illinois and Maryland to these facts, and their voices being now strong in the management of the finances of this country, their party having charge of the White House and being omnipotent in the Senate and in the House, I hope there will be no dispute hereafter as to who is responsible for the increases to which I have called attention.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman from Georgia state exactly the amount, as I did not happen to hear it, of the increases in this bill by the Senate and also the number of new officers proposed to be appointed?

Mr. CLEMENTS. I have done so heretofore in detail. The first increase is the salary of the seven hundred and ninety-five school teachers, whose compensation is increased $5 each. There is an increase of thirty-two policemen, fifteen of whom will receive $900, fifteen $1,050, and two $1,140. And also this superintendent of charities at an annual compensation of $3,000. That is an increase in the number of officers and an increase in the salaries to that extent over the provisions of the bill as it passed the House.

Mr. HAUGEN. As I understand the gentleman from Georgia he does not disapprove of the increases?

Mr. CLEMENTS. I do disapprove of the increase of the salaries of the school-teachers. I fail to see the necessity of so much increase in the police force. I do not disapprove of the establishment of this office of superintendent of charities, for I believe that something of the kind is necessary.

Mr. DOCKERY. I understand this is a conference report on the District of Columbia appropriation bill that passed the House in December last?

Mr. CLEMENTS. It is.

Mr. DOCKERY. And under such extraordinary circumstances of haste that it was considered in the absence of the minority members of the subcommittee who had charge of the bill, because of sickness which detained them from the House?

Mr. CLEMENTS. Well, I did not intend to discuss the haste with which the bill was passed through the House; but since the gentleman has mentioned it I only wish to say that the haste with which it was passed through the House does not seem to have expedited its becoming a law, because we have now passed the end of the fiscal year and it has not yet become a law. The District of Columbia is operating under a resolution extending and continuing the appropriations of the current year until the passage of this bill.

Mr. PETERS. That delay was not the fault at this end of the Capitol, I believe.

Mr. CLEMENTS. No; I do not think it was.

Mr. MAISH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maryland a question in regard to the revenues of the District of Columbia and the amounts that are paid out.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Has my friend from Georgia yielded the floor?

Mr. CLEMENTS. I yield to my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAISH] for a question.

Mr. MAISH. I notice, Mr. Speaker, that the appropriation for increasing electric lighting was increased $5,000 also. I notice that provision is made here to pay 60 cents for lights and also 40 cents for lights. I suppose the 60 cents is for electric lighting with underground wires. Now, I would like to know what is paid in the District of Columbia for electric lighting, if the gentleman is able to tell me.

Mr. CLEMENTS. The amount is stated in the bill. I have not a copy of the bill.

Mr. MAISH. What is now paid?

Mr. HOLMAN. Under the present law?

Mr. MAISH. It provides that the amount shall not exceed 60 cents per night. Of course that does not tell what is now paid. Perhaps the gentleman can tell.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Perhaps the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS], in charge of the bill, can give the gentleman the information he asks. I do not know what is actually expended. That is the limit fixed in the bill. What the actual expenditure is I do not know.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I would state that the limit is fixed in the bill at a sum not to exceed 60 cents from sunset to sunrise and at present the rates are declining steadily. In my own judgment they are not low enough now, but we are trying to cut them down. The gentleman will find in the conference report a provision for a commission with respect to the whole subject of electric lighting which will tend to make a radical reform in this direction. It is a provision that requires an army engineer, a civil engineer, and an electrician to report upon this matter of subways or conduits that can be used by the city and paid for; the privilege not given away, as it is now, but leased for a term of years or otherwise, giving a revenue to the city; that the city may, without having rival companies here cutting up the streets, yet have the cheapest possible light and the best opportunity for revenue.

I would say further to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the Senate struck out by amendment the provision of the House which was intended to give competition in the electric lighting. At present there is but one company here, but the rates charged are a little lower in many cities and not quite as great as in some cities. The House sought to introduce competition, but out of our provision has arisen this proposition to speedily have a report whereby it will be practicable for the city itself to have its subways or conduits, and lease them for a revenue, and regulate the terms of their occupation by existing companies, for a term of years or otherwise, making a radical reform in this habit of giving corporations the public avenues and streets without any benefit to the public. I think my friends will find that the result of the compromise proposition for which they labored, and which they finally secured, will be a great benefit, in a short time, in the cost and efficiency of electric lighting.

My friend from Iowa [Mr. KERR] was about to ask me a question.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. I was about to ask how these expenses are paid and if the people of the District have favored this increase in the salaries, the people who have to pay their share of the taxes.

Mr. MCCOMAS. In response to that I would say to the gentleman that there is a great and constant demand from many quarters for increase of offices and salaries. The committee in the House, on both sides of the House, firmly resisted that growing habit, and have eliminated from this bill, as my colleague on the committee has stated, those increases except, I believe, that of $5 to school teachers, amounting to about $4,000, in a total of over $6,000,000 of appropriations. Now, I want to devote a little time to another matter here.

Mr. MAISH. I would like to know whether the gentleman can answer my question at all.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. How is the money provided to pay these expenses?

Mr. MCCOMAS. I will state to my friend that the bill, as it passed the House, includes the District revenues on real and personal property and also the revenues of the water department. The total appropriations in the bill, as it passed the House, were $5,332,934.15.

To this the Senate added $752,810, making a total of $6,085,744.15. Now, in the conference the House conferees succeeded in reducing the excess of appropriations made by the Senate in the sum of $316,300, leaving the total of the bill, as agreed on in conference, $5,769,444.15, and the water-department revenue is $233,407.18, making the total amount to come out of the District of Columbia and out of the Treasury of the United States $5,536,036.97, one-half of which is $2,768,018.48. And the estimated revenues of the District for 1891 are, according to the annual estimates, in excess of this one-half. According to the corrected estimates made under the scrutiny of the subcommittee, the amount will appear to be really about $2,600,000. The estimated revenue from new-building permits is $97,500, making in all $2,698,100.22, apparently leaving on the estimated revenue a deficit of $69,918.26; but in the judgment of the conferees in the House and Senate it is manifest that these revenues will about be supplied by the annual excess of building permits and the increase from the collection of personal taxes to be enforced under this bill.

And even if there happened to be a shortage of $15,000 or $20,000, that will simply end in cutting off one square of street from being asphalted or one or two items of improvement on permanent works here and there, which would be no inconvenience to the people and far within the limits of the bill as this House passed it.

I would say furthermore, Mr. Speaker, that the Senate—

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. Is half of it paid by the Government?

Mr. MCCOMAS. As I have said, one half is paid by the Government and the other half by the District of Columbia.

I would say further that there was a Senate amendment which was constantly resisted by all the conferees of this House, an amendment which provided for an expenditure of money far beyond the actual revenues of the District of Columbia. We took the position that we would not consent to an appropriation of money beyond the revenues, with the expectation of spreading it over twenty-five annual payments. We would not consent to mortgage the future revenues to an extent beyond the actual revenues of the District. Finally, after consultation and conference, the Senate agreed to yield to our proposition; and so the bill is now based substantially on the actual revenues of the District.

My colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], has made one suggestion and inquiry to which I shall give one minute in passing. It is in relation to the bill of two years ago and the present bill; the passage of the bill by the House early in the session and its passage late by the Senate. The subcommittee which prepared this bill was composed of members of the Committee on Appropriations of different politics, and the gentleman from Missouri was a most industrious and valuable member of that subcommittee. Several of these gentlemen brought six years' knowledge and experience of appropriations for the District of Columbia to bear in the consideration of this measure, and they knew as much about it in December last as they had known in any previous December, and with the zeal and ability of two other members, one the interlocutor of my colleague from Georgia, they were able to prepare the bill and report it to this House in December.

It was passed on the 8th of January in such shape that the Senate, which kept it for a long while, did not materially change its provisions. They accepted its frame-work; accepted its reforms and improvements, but made a number of amendments that proposed increases of salary, as my colleague has said, and created new offices. To these the House has in large measure successfully objected through its conferees; and the bill, although it has been long in the Senate, stands here to-day as the House bill in larger measure than usual. I therefore, for no purpose of controversy, but to answer the inquiry of my friend, desire to say that at the first session of last Congress the District appropriation bill passed the House on May 21, 1883, or nearly six months after the meeting of Congress. That was not the fault of the industrious subcommittee under the able lead of my friend from Georgia [Mr. CLEMENTS]. The Senate passed the bill with one hundred and ninety-two amendments, June 1, or twenty-three days after its passage by the House, and with $855,628.65 added to the amount of the appropriation.

The present bill was passed by the House on January 8, 1890, or only thirty-eight days after the meeting of Congress. The Senate passed the bill April 22, 1890, or three and a half months after its passage by the House, with only one hundred and sixty-five amendments, as against one hundred and ninety-two, and with only $752,810 added thereto. As my colleague has well stated, a large number of these amendments were for increases of salaries, and new offices, and proposed increases in general appropriations from which they have receded or upon which a compromise was reached; so that the bill stands as the House bill substantially, except in the matter of a superintendent of charities, to which my colleague has given full attention.

In the matter of electric lighting we got a compromise in the interests of the people and tax-payers which will have a good effect. And also on the amendment in respect to the right of roads to issue further stock. As finally agreed to, it is provided the stock issued shall be sold at market prices, and we have made the further condition that if the roads on either side of the Capitol do not within two years give rapid transit they shall forfeit their charters. I apprehend that steps will be taken within the time prescribed which will give the public the benefit of rapid transit over these lines where these corporations have been so largely benefited in their revenues by reason of the location of their lines.

Mr. MAISH. If the gentleman will allow me, I do not understand that he has answered my question as to what was paid in the District of Columbia for electric lighting.

Mr. MCCOMAS. An effort has been made to reduce the rate. It is now limited to 60 cents. My papers are not at hand to enable me to give the gentleman all the information he desires. I think it is 55 or 60 cents for underground and 40 cents for above ground.

Mr. CUTCHEON. That is per light per night?

Mr. MCCOMAS. Yes, sir; from sunset to sunrise.

Mr. MAISH. For lights of 2,000 candle-power.

I call the gentleman's attention to the further fact that quite recently in the city of Baltimore the Brush Electric-Light Company has agreed to furnish light to that city for 35 cents per light of 2,000 candle-power. Now, I would like to know why it is that such an enormous price is paid for electric lighting in the District of Columbia.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I want to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that in the original bill as it passed this House we had a provision which would have enabled us to have competition here in the electric lighting, but that was firmly resisted by the Senate.

Mr. MAISH. You ought never to have yielded.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I can now answer the gentleman's question as to the exact cost of electric lighting here. The price paid is from 58½ to 59 cents per light by underground wires. We only agreed to surrender that provision, which would have permitted competition in electric lighting in Washington, upon the Senate agreeing to insert an amendment which I commend to the gentleman from Pennsylvania and which I believe covers the whole subject. The gentlemen who favored having but one company insisted, as against our propositions, that if there were two companies they would tear up the streets more than one company would and afterwards would combine so as to deprive the public of the benefit of competition, and, therefore, they steadily resisted our efforts to provide for competition.

We then proposed that there should be a provision by which the city itself should own the conduits and subways and have them under its control, and we agreed upon the provision of the bill which provides for this board of engineers to be composed of men who have no interest in any patent or in any special device for electric lighting, to examine into the question and to report a plan for making these conduits which the city shall own and can lease to the electric-light company and probably derive a revenue therefrom. I think that will be a long way in advance of the plan of attempting to have competing companies. The commission are to inquire into the matter and to report at the beginning of the first session of the next Congress. I think the required remedy will be found in that direction, and if the commission report wisely and well it will be not only an advantage to the city, but an advantage to the whole country.

Mr. MAISH. I also find that an amendment was agreed to, permitting the erection of overhead wires. I had hoped that there would be no more overhead wires permitted to be erected in the city of Washington.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Those overhead wires are simply to connect with the new station-houses temporarily, pending the adoption of this general system. As we are about to adopt a general system, it would be very unwise to cut up the streets to reach the new station-houses which must be reached by the Government and District wires, so we made this temporary appropriation for the purpose.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to occupy a few minutes in answering more accurately the question which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] put to me awhile ago. He asked me to state the number of new offices or salaries provided for in the House bill beyond those included in the current law. I said to him that the number was very small, not having in mind at the moment the number of additional firemen and teachers provided for. In the House bill as it passed this body there were carried the salaries of fifty-six teachers and twenty-three other additional employes, including about eleven firemen, making a total of seventy-nine additional employes, with salaries more than under the current law.

Mr. SAYERS. Can the gentleman state the total number of persons that are in the employ of the District and the total number provided for in the bill as it passed the House?

Mr. CLEMENTS. Under the current law there are fifteen hundred and sixty-nine salaries paid, exclusive of the water department, and as the bill went to the Senate it carried sixteen hundred and forty-eight an increase of seventy-nine. As the bill is now, it provides for one hundred and fourteen new officials or employes above the current law and an increase of the salaries of seven hundred and ninety-five teachers $5 each over the current law.

Mr. MCCOMAS. And let me state, for the benefit of my friend from Texas, that that increase comprises fifty-six employes connected with the public schools.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I have just stated that.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Then there is an increase of five in the police department, eleven in the fire department, one in the telegraph service, one in the Reform School, and three examiners of engineers required by law—

Mr. DOCKERY. Did the Senate cut down any of those increases?

Mr. MCCOMAS. Oh, no.

Mr. CLEMENTS. The Senate generally increases instead of cutting down. I want to say in regard to these five additional policemen that I agreed to that item when the bill was being made up in the House, because I believed, as I believe now, that there ought to be some additional policemen, especially if we can induce the police management of the District to so govern the force as to give greater protection to human life at the corners and crossings of the streets.

I certainly would not object to a reasonable increase of the police if the force could be so managed as to give greater protection in this respect and if the police courts could be induced to put a higher estimate upon human life in this city. It seems to me that we ought to have policemen enough to put a check upon the rapid driving of sporting men and coachmen who drive around the street corners at such a rate that women and children and even able bodied men are not secure. I am in favor of the necessary police force such as to enable a correction of this, which I consider a very great nuisance, and which exists in this city to an extent that I have never seen it anywhere else.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I now move the previous question.

Mr. MAISH. Will the gentleman allow a portion of the contract to which I alluded be read, the contract made with the city of Baltimore for electric lighting there?

Mr. MCCOMAS. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. MAISH. I also call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that, as I understand, the original bill provided for the payment of a larger amount per light than was demanded by the company.

Mr. MCCOMAS. That is a mistake.

Mr. MAISH. I understand that under the contract the company will receive 58½ cents per light, while this bill provides that 60 cents may be paid.

Mr. MCCOMAS. But the bill was passed before the contract was made. As the gentleman will recollect and as I stated in my former remarks, the price charged for electric lighting has been going down from year to year during the last five or six years; and we have been putting down the limit accordingly. We could not reduce the limit below the possible contract price. In this case the limit fixed was 60 cents and the company has reduced the price to 58½. The former limit was 65 cents and the contract price sixty-odd cents. Thus the contract price is being pressed down. But the real way to secure a reduction of price in this matter is the plan now proposed in the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. MAISH. I now ask the Clerk to read a portion of the contract to which I referred.

The Clerk read as follows:

Now, therefore, the said Brush Electric Company hereby proposes to the mayor and city council of Baltimore to enter into a contract with the said mayor and city council to light all the streets, lanes, alleys, parks, public buildings, and other places where electric arc lights are now used by said city, or shall be authorized to be placed by the general superintendent of lamps, with electric arc lights of not less than 2,000 nominal candle power, for the term of five years, accounting from the 1st day of July, 1890, at the rate of 35 cents per light per night, payable monthly, with the privilege to the mayor of Baltimore to terminate the contract at the end of any two years thereof, by giving a notice in writing to that effect at least thirty days before the expiration of such period.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS] whether this bill does not now contain some legislation relating to street railroads in the District of Columbia.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I stated awhile ago and I will now state again to my friend—

Mr. HEMPHILL. I was out of the Hall at the time.

Mr. MCCOMAS. That the bill now embraces a Senate amendment giving the street railways the right to issue stock for money they have expended or may expend (the Senate amendment originally was for money they may expend) in equipping their roads with modern motive power and grooved rails.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Is it the same proposition that is printed in the Post of this morning?

Mr. MCCOMAS. I do not know what is printed in the Post. But in conference an amendment (to which I assented) was agreed upon providing that these companies in issuing such stock shall sell it at the market price and make full report to the District commissioners of the quantity of stock sold and the amount received for such stock, showing the actual transaction and the increase of stock under this power; and providing further that all street railways reaching from Georgetown to the Capitol and going beyond the Capitol on either side—the main trunk lines of street railways—shall within two years, on all of their lines, give to the people rapid transit by the adoption of cable, electric, pneumatic, or other modern motive power, in default of which there shall be a forfeiture of their charters at the end of two years from this date. That has been agreed upon in conference and is now reported.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I would like to inquire whether this action has been had upon any information except such as the conferees may have had in their own minds; whether they have asked or consulted anybody in regard to the matter.

Mr. McCOMAS. I will say to the gentleman that this matter came to my attention in conference after suggestions from outside sources. I inquired and other members of the conference committee inquired, and the information given to us by railroad men was that eighteen months would suffice under ordinary circumstances for this change of motive power. The limit fixed here is two years; and full enough information was received to assure us absolutely beyond possibility of mistake that two years will be ample; and that will be a long time for the public to wait.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Is any limit provided as to the amount of stock which these companies may issue?

Mr. McCOMAS. It must be only for the amount of money needed for the extension of their lines and the improvements required; the stock must be sold at the market price and a full statement of the transaction reported under oath to the commissioners.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman desire the adoption of this report now?

Mr. McCOMAS. Unless some one wishes to ask further questions, I call for a vote on the adoption of the report.

Mr. DOCKERY. I suppose it is the understanding that this is the only business to be transacted to-day. If so, we are willing to concur in the report.

Mr. McCOMAS. I have no knowledge of anything else that may come up.

Mr. DOCKERY. If, however, there is to be any other business we want a vote on this matter.

Mr. McCOMAS. I would like to have this report adopted.

Mr. DOCKERY. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] whether there is any other business to come up.

Mr. CANNON. I can not speak for anybody but myself. I think the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] wants to ask unanimous consent to concur in an amendment of the Senate to the Wyoming bill. If that can not be done by unanimous consent, then, so far as I am concerned, I will vote for an adjournment. I do not know what the House may feel disposed to do.

Mr. McCOMAS. Now, Mr. Speaker, let us first dispose of this report.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire, first, Mr. Speaker, to inquire the parliamentary status of that bill, whether it would require unanimous consent.

Mr. CANNON. I suppose it would.

Mr. CAREY. Oh, no; it is privileged.

Mr. McCOMAS. Let us first dispose of this District of Columbia bill. There is no reason why we should not have a vote upon it.

I call for a vote on the proposition.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the adoption of the report.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 66, no 0.

Mr. MILLS. No quorum.

Mr. CANNON. I want to make this suggestion, Mr. Speaker, if I can, by unanimous consent. It seems to me that this conference report ought to be adopted; and if it is the sense of gentlemen—because I think it is doubtful if there is a quorum present—to let the report be adopted, the moment it is adopted I will submit a motion for adjournment. That is all I can say.

Mr. MILLS. But let it be understood that no other business will be taken up. Let there be unanimous consent to an adjournment.

Mr. CANNON. I can only speak for myself.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that any agreement of that character should include the right to lay before the House certain matters, executive communications and other documents, for reference.

Mr. MILLS. There would be no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WADE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. CANNON. There is no quorum here.

Mr. WADE. I am not responsible for that.

Mr. CANNON. Many members have already left the city in expectation of the Fourth of July adjournment; everybody wants to go. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. WADE. I want to be heard a moment on this proposition. We have a bill here from the committee of which I am chairman, that we want to bring before this House for consideration. We can present our views before the House just as well whether a quorum is present or not. If gentlemen do not choose to remain here and attend to their business, it is not our fault. The Labor Committee has not been permitted to occupy very much of the time of this House. We believe we are going to pass such legislation as the laboring people of the country are demanding. Now we come before the House with one of these measures, and if these gentlemen want us to adjourn and not give us an opportunity to pass this bill, that is all right. It is their lookout. But I think the House could very well stay here and listen to this committee's report for one hour before adjournment.

Mr. CANNON. But there is evidently no quorum present, and no business can be transacted if the point is insisted upon.

Mr. WADE. We have not had a recognition this Congress. These people are demanding to be heard all through the country. It is their right to come before Congress, and I ask you not to adjourn.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman knows that a quorum is not present, and probably not in the city.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. It does not seem to me that a recognition of the gentleman from Missouri would be of any particular value in the absence of a quorum.

Mr. DOCKERY. If we can not pass the District of Columbia appropriation bill in the absence of a quorum, certainly no other business could be done for the same reason.

Mr. WADE. It seems to me that the chairman of the committee ought to know what is beneficial to his committee. I ask the House to allow us to proceed with this matter.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. This is only proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to ask the attention of the House for one moment.

Mr. ANDREW. I call for the regular order.

Mr. MILLS. Oh, no; let the gentleman from Illinois make his statement.

Mr. CANNON. I appeal to the gentleman from Missouri to take this into consideration: That it is evident to everybody present there is no quorum here now, and that we can adopt this District of Columbia conference report by unanimous consent, and that is as far, evidently, as it is practicable to go. The gentleman's matter would be advanced rather than retarded by the House adjourning now and taking it up, say on Tuesday.

Mr. MILLS. That is correct. Now, let us have unanimous consent, that after the vote on the conference report is taken the House shall adjourn.

Mr. WADE. I will not give that consent.

Mr. McCOMAS. I hope that will be done, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. COLEMAN. No; I want the Labor Committee to be heard.

Mr. WADE. And if gentlemen do not want to stay and listen to the arguments they need not. We do not want to keep them here; we do not expect to get a vote. We simply want to bring the matter before the House for consideration.

Mr. BLAND. What is the reason of this remarkable urgency now? This is the first time I have heard the gentleman so anxious to get this matter up when he knows there is no quorum here.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Ordinarily the object of making an argument is that it may have some weight with the people who hear it. What is the object of my friend in making an argument when there is nobody to hear it?

Mr. COLEMAN. There are enough here to discuss this matter; and if there are enough to discuss the District of Columbia appropriation bill there are enough to argue the labor matter.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. But if you can not pass the appropriation bill, evidently you can not take up the other.

Mr. WADE. I will say this: That if gentlemen want to leave the House without regard to the duties they owe to the country and are willing to go, we can not expect them to stay, of course.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. But my friend from Missouri can see that if gentlemen do not desire to remain there is no use in attempting to keep them, when there are not enough present to transact business.

Mr. McCOMAS. I know my friend's anxiety, and I desire to help him, but if there is no quorum and unanimous consent can not be had, of course that is the end of it.

Mr. WADE. I will agree to an adjournment if on Tuesday we can take up this bill and pass it. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEARD. I hope my colleague will divide his proposition, as it is evidently divisible. There may be a good many who are willing to take up the bill and consider it, but it might be hard to combine the two.

Mr. WADE. I mean to take it up and consider it.

Mr. ANDREW. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again announce the vote just taken. The yeas are 66, nays none.

Does the gentleman insist upon the point that no quorum is present?

Mr. MILLS. I do.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I want to make, if I can, an appeal to the House in the way of expediting the business. It is evident that nothing can be done to-day unless by unanimous consent. Now, I ask the gentleman from Texas not to make the point of no quorum—

Mr. WADE. If he does not I will.

Mr. CANNON. Let the conference report be adopted, the messages from the President and other Executive documents referred, and I will make the motion to adjourn, and to the best of my ability seek to have it adopted.

Mr. COLEMAN. I object.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order, as it is evident nothing can be done.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is made that no quorum is present.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Then I call for tellers, and I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that if this motion is carried to pass the conference report I shall help to bring about an adjournment.

Tellers were ordered; and the Speaker designated Messrs. MCCOMAS and BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, to act as tellers.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 83, noes 4.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I make the point that there is no quorum. I may withdraw it hereafter.

Mr. CANNON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. If it is understood that the House is to adjourn I will withdraw the point.

Mr. MCCOMAS. It is evident that the House is going to adjourn, anyway.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I withdraw the point.

Mr. CLUNIE. I make the point that there is no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California makes the point that there is no quorum, and the Chair will ascertain. [After a count of members present.] There are 133 members present.

Mr. CANNON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I make the point of order that the motion to adjourn has not the preference over the vote upon a conference report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order, a quorum not being present on a count by the Chair.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken on the motion to adjourn, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I demand a division, and I appeal to the House now to allow this conference report to go through.

Pending the division Mr. MCCOMAS withdrew his demand for a division.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. STRUBLE, for fifteen days.

To Mr. KERR, of Iowa, until July 19, on account of important business.

To Mr. MORRILL, until July 10, on account of public business.

To Mr. LODGE, for ten days, on account of important business.

The motion to adjourn was agreed to; and accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, July 7, at 12 o'clock m.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9603) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

EUGENE HALE,

W. B. ALLISON,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

ROBERT R. HITT,

MARK H. DUNNELL,

JAMES B. MCCREARY,

Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have it explained a little on a few points first, if the Senator in charge will kindly explain the material points of difference, and what was done with the Senate amendments.

Mr. HALE. The bill as reported from the conference committee is almost precisely the same as it passed the Senate, the House conferees agreeing to the Senate amendments I think, in nearly all cases. If there is any particular amendment that the Senator from Vermont has in his mind, I shall be glad to explain it.

Mr. DOLPH. I should be glad to have the Senator explain what was done with the amendment increasing the salary of the minister at Constantinople.

Mr. HALE. That was objected to by the House conferees as not being a necessary increase, but the conferees on the part of the Senate felt that that was a thing to insist upon, all the more because it had been put in by the Senate and not by the committee, and that they were instructed by the Senate, and the Senate conferees enforced that insistence. So it remains as the Senate put it in the bill.

The report was concurred in.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4112) to amend section 1225 of the Revised Statutes, concerning details of officers of the Army and Navy to educational institutions, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WALTHALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3334) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to Charles W. Thomas two James's rifled cannon, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. TELLER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3938) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to convey to the Rio Grande Junction Railway Company certain lands in the State of Colorado in lieu of certain other lands in said State conveyed by the said company to the United States, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BATE, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, submitted the views of the minority on the bill (S. 3991) for preventing adulteration and misbranding of food and drugs, and preventing poisonous adulterations, and for other purposes; which were ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MANDERSON introduced a bill (S. 4190) granting an increase of pension to Robert Moran; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 4191) setting apart a tract of land to be used as a cemetery by the order of Free Masons of Breckenridge, Colo.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4192) granting a pension to Charles Roughan; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 4193) for the relief of John M. Giffin; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENT TO APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PADDOCK submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

THE REVENUE BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business? If there be none, that order is closed.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 9416.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar, under Rule VIII, being in order, the Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9416) to reduce the revenue and equalize duties on imports, and for other purposes.

Mr. FRYE rose.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say to the Senator from Maine that I shall yield to him so far as to have this bill laid aside informally for the day in order that he may get through with the bills from his committee which are under consideration.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to suggest—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate can proceed only by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRIS. I do not propose to debate the question, but I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will hear the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HARRIS. If this bill is taken up at this hour it will not make it the unfinished business at 2 o'clock?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will not.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I suggest to the Senator from Vermont that he wait until 2 o'clock to call up his bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I prefer to have it taken up at the present time.

Mr. HARRIS. I simply wanted to ascertain the parliamentary status it would occupy.

Mr. GIBSON. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce whether it is his purpose to ask for the consideration of the river and harbor bill to-day. He stated that on this day he would ask that that bill be taken up.

Mr. MORRILL. He can not wish to have it taken up until he gets through with the first bills before the Senate from his committee.

Mr. FRYE. I gave notice that I should ask the Senate to consider the river and harbor bill to-day. So far as I am concerned, I am not particular about its consideration to-day; but I shall certainly feel obliged to ask for its consideration before the tariff bill shall be completed in the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We must take the opinion of the Senate on that subject.

Mr. FRYE. Undoubtedly I shall have to yield to the opinion of the Senate, as the Senator from Vermont suggests. I shall not antagonize taking up the tariff bill by the river and harbor bill at this moment, but I understand that appropriation bills ordinarily, when they are ready for consideration, have the right of way. If the tariff bill was going to consume two or three weeks' time, I certainly, under present instructions from my committee, could not consent to yield that long.

Mr. PLUMB. I want to say to the Senator from Maine that it will not do to trust to unanimous consent to get up the river and harbor bill during the pendency of the tariff bill, because I certainly, as one member of this body, would object to the displacement of the tariff bill by the river and harbor bill.

Mr. FRYE. I should not trust to unanimous consent and should not expect to obtain it from the Senate.

Mr. PLUMB. Then, of course, the Senator would have to move to take up the bill.

Mr. FRYE. I would have to move to take it up.

Mr. PLUMB. Then what is gained by taking up the tariff bill now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar, under Rule VIII, being in order, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9416) to reduce the revenue and equalize the duties on imports, and for other purposes. [Putting the question.] The Chair is unable to decide by the sound.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GORMAN. As I understand, by unanimous consent the shipping bills are in order to-day at 2 o'clock. Am I correct in that statement?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would state in response to the Senator from Maryland that the bill previously moved by the Senator from Maine, commonly known as the shipping bill, is the unfinished business at 2 o'clock, and will come up at that time without motion.

Mr. GORMAN. Then do I understand that the Senator from Vermont desires to take up the tariff bill and have it considered only from half past 12 until 2?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is what he wants to do, and the yeas and nays have been ordered on it.

Mr. GORMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] whether he proposes that the tariff bill shall be considered only from now until 2 o'clock to-day, and then give way to the regular order.

Mr. MORRILL. I have already stated that I should give way to the Senator from Maine for what are called the shipping bills, to take them up whenever he pleases; but I desire to have this bill before the Senate as the regular business from and after this time, although I expect, of course, to yield to regular appropriation bills whenever they are ready.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is, general appropriation bills?

Mr. MORRILL. General appropriation bills.

Mr. CARLISLE. Mr. President, I am unable to see from my limited acquaintance with the methods of procedure in this body that anything is to be gained by taking up the tariff bill at this time. There certainly is nothing to be gained if it is to be laid aside from time to time for the purpose of taking up other matters. I have understood that the Senator from Maine desires to complete the consideration of the two bills known as the shipping bills; that after they are disposed of he desires to call up for consideration the river and harbor bill, and that the Committee on Appropriations have, or soon will have, ready the sundry civil appropriation bill, and perhaps other appropriation bills which ought to be considered and passed upon by the Senate.

I hope, therefore, that the Senator from Vermont will not insist on his motion, or, if he does, that the Senate will not sustain him, so that when the tariff bill shall be taken up for consideration we can proceed with it in the regular way until it is completed.

Mr. MORRILL. If we are to bring this session to a close at any early period, it is necessary that we should take up the most important bills that we have before us. My purpose was merely that this bill should be in order from and after the disposition of the bills in charge of the Senator from Maine, so that Senators who desire to speak at large upon the subject of the tariff should have an opportunity, and, if not, that we should go on as usual and act on amendments as the bill is read.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Vermont allow me to ask him what he gains? I do not know of any opposition on either side of this Chamber to taking up the tariff bill for consideration. What is to be gained by taking it up at twelve and a half o'clock in the morning, when it goes down with the fall of the gavel at 2 and loses whatever it may have gained?

Mr. MORRILL. We shall gain the reading of the bill at least.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the regular order. Debate is not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object to further debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays having been ordered on the question of proceeding to the consideration of the bill, the roll will be called.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS].

Mr. PADDOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the first Order of Business under Rule VIII.

LAND COURT.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the private land claims bill that was up the other day.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1042) to establish a United States land court, and to provide for the settlement of private land claims in certain States and Territories.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill at the point where the reading stopped on Thursday last. The next amendment of the Committee on Private Land Claims was, in section 9, line 10, after "United States," to insert:

On any such appeal the Supreme Court shall retry the cause, as well the issues of fact as of law, and may take testimony in addition to that given in the court below, and may amend the record of the proceedings below as truth and justice may require; and on such retrial and hearing every question shall be open, and the decision of the Supreme Court thereon shall be final and conclusive.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] could reconcile my vote, at least. This proposed amendment says:

On any such appeal the Supreme Court shall retry the cause, as well the issues of fact as of law, and may take testimony in addition to that given in the court below, and may amend the record of the proceedings below as truth and justice may require; and on such retrial and hearing every question shall be open.

If all these claims covered immense regions like the Maxwell grant, for example, perhaps hundreds of thousands of acres, nobody knows how much they are, it would not be a matter of so much consequence, but many of these cases involve comparatively small values, and it is provided here that after the United States shall have tried these causes in its own courts and with abundant counsel that the resources of the Government enable it to employ, an appeal may, within six months, be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States. That court is already four years behind in its business, and Congress gives no very encouraging indication of a purpose to relieve it by any proper organization or reorganization of the courts.

It is quite supposable that the landholder in the Territory down there who had obtained what he considered, or whose father had obtained what he considered, a perfect title from the Spanish or the Mexican Government, guaranteed to him by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, will be brought on an appeal to Washington that may involve two, three, or four thousand dollars, to wait four years for trial, and to find then every detail, even the most minute detail of facts is to be brought in question again here, and that he will be expected to bring his witnesses a thousand or fifteen hundred miles, more or less, and await the deliberate proceedings of this august tribunal at Washington.

To one who is not engaged in any of this business, and perhaps does not question it at all, this seems to be prima facie a provision of possibly very great injustice indeed.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut a moment to section 16 of the bill, wherein the small holdings are provided for to be disposed of—

Mr. HAWLEY. I notice that the small holdings are provided for.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to say in regard to this that there are a few of these grants of immense magnitude, and their holders necessarily feel very anxious that they should have a full and perfect title. There is a grant in Arizona covering some 4,000,000 acres, and its holders have asked us to exclude Arizona from the bill; but the committee thought that it would be better to have the title settled, and that if there should be any miscarriage in the court below in regard to so important a matter it might be considered by the Supreme Court of the United States, and that by no possibility shall such an enormous grant as that be recognized without the fullest scrutiny and consideration by the highest judicial tribunal. There is a claim of title to an enormous grant, and there should be full opportunity to have it examined by the Supreme Court of the United States. It will not delay the proceeding really.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President—

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator from Vermont allow me just a word in connection with what the Senator from Nevada has said?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. I call the Senator's attention, as he is about to speak upon the subject, to the fact that the saving section provides that only a man holding not exceeding 160 acres of land which he has held for twenty years next preceding, etc., may have his title decided by the court below without an appeal—a man holding 160 acres in Arizona or New Mexico. It is sometimes worth but a very small price with a little adobe cabin upon it. I do not think a man with a thousand acres would be reached.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The broad answer to my friend from Connecticut, whose solicitude I thoroughly share in to do right, is this: In the first place, if he will do me the honor to listen to me—

Mr. HAWLEY. I am listening.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This bill does not provide for people who claim to have perfect titles from the Mexican or Spanish Government, as it should not. It leaves the perfect titles, or people who pretend that they have perfect titles, on their own ancient footing, as all changes of territory between sovereigns always do. They can defend their rights in the courts if they have any, and if not they lose them. It only provides for the imperfect, the inchoate claims that the Spanish or Mexican Government would have been bound in honor and upon principles of public justice to recognize and make perfect. So all matters about people who claim that they have a good title already, all arguments of that kind have no application here, for they are not required or permitted to come into court at all.

In the second place, in regard to these open cases and in regard to disputed ones, it is only the appeal cases, of course, that the Supreme Court has to retry on either the facts or the law. When, therefore, the decision of the court below is so obviously just and so clear that neither party wishes to appeal, on our side under the protection of the Attorney-General protecting the public interests and the interests of the settlers and on the other side the claimants, that ends it.

Now as to cases that may be appealed, what is the state of the provision of this section? It is that the Supreme Court of the United States shall have precisely the same power and do precisely the same thing that it does now in all equity cases from every State and Territory in the Union, with the addition that the Supreme Court of the United States may, if it see cause to do it, if any new discovered evidence comes, as it does in admiralty appeals or did until recently, procure that additional evidence if any shall appear. Therefore the retrial of the facts, unless additional evidence is to be taken, and then it is taken under commission and not by witnesses present in court, is not an occasion of delay. All that the Supreme Court does is to do precisely what it does in every equity cause that ever comes to its consideration, and that is not to be bound by the action of the court below as to what the fact is appearing upon the evidence sent up, but it has the right to rejudge all the action of that tribunal in its findings of fact, just as I repeat it does in every equity cause that comes to it at all.

Surely, then, there is no hardship upon claimants, and there is every security for an honest claimant who finds himself defeated in the court below upon a question of fact to have the misjudgment of the evidence by these judges reviewed by the Supreme Court, and to let the judges below know that that hangs over their heads. Of course the appeal comes up on the evidence taken in the court below; but if anything new is discovered, as in the famous California cases, newly discovered evidence (which under the California rule we applied in those old days; the Supreme Court could not open the case and retry it upon the facts), then it is within the mission of the court not to allow a fraud to be committed or injustice to be done when some subsequent evidence is before it that the court below is unable to get at. So it appears to me the provision is just exactly as it ought to be for justice and for safety.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the effect of this provision in this bill will be to transfer the trial of all causes of any importance that occur before this court from the place where they were first investigated to Washington City, and it will open a tremendous door for the employment of able and distinguished counsel here for reargument and retrial of causes that have been decided or ought to have been decided finally in the court below, the peculiar commission that we are here organizing to try cases of this kind.

An action of ejectment is tried in Alabama which involves a question of the construction of a statute of the United States. It comes to the supreme court of Alabama, involving a question of the construction of a statute of the United States. It comes to the supreme court of Alabama, and is tried and decided upon the record made in the circuit court of that State. Then it is brought here under the judiciary act by writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States, and to-day, in the supreme court of Alabama and in the Supreme Court of the United States, the title to that tract of land is determined by the state of the facts presented in the record. The bill of exceptions being a part of the record, the adjudication of the court is final, without the resort to any new evidence or without opening up the case anew.

The same effect is produced if the question arises under a treaty between the United States and a foreign Government; as for instance in the case of Spanish grants in the State of Alabama and the States of Florida and Louisiana and elsewhere, the courts in all these cases during all the progress we have made in jurisprudence have been held competent to make a final decision upon the facts presented to them, competent to ascertain the facts that are presented to them, whether the courts are sitting in equity or whether they are sitting as common-law courts.

There is no reason why one of these contested Mexican land grants under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo or the Gadsden treaty should be left open after it had been finally decided by the five judges that we create to hear and determine these causes which does not apply equally to an action of ejectment tried in the State of Alabama, that involves the question of a grant under a Spanish treaty or under a statute of the United States.

There ought to be a finality of decision, and it ought to be the business of the Congress of the United States in providing new jurisdictions to have the decision made final as soon as it can be done with due regard to justice and truth. But after the cause has been decided in this court of five judges, who are paid very large salaries and are supposed to be men of eminent ability—after it has been decided there as an equity cause upon the examination of witnesses in court, or upon the examination of witnesses by deposition or upon interrogatory and final decree is made by these five judges in the court below, an appeal is taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, and this bill provides or the amendment provides:

On any such appeal the Supreme Court shall retry the cause, as well the issues of fact as of law, and may take testimony in addition to that given in the court below, and may amend the record of the proceedings below as truth and justice may require; and on such retrial and hearing every question shall be open, and the decision of the Supreme Court thereon shall be final and conclusive.

The trial in the court below is thus made a mere preliminary proceeding. It is no more than the report of a committee of this body. It is not as much in dignity and in character according to this amendment to this bill as the report of a committee of this body upon the facts which may be brought in evidence before it upon an investigation ordered by the Senate. The case must come here and be tried de novo upon such evidence and under such forms of procedure as the Supreme Court of the United States shall rule, and the decision in the court below upon a matter of fact or upon a matter of law creates not even a presumption in favor of its regularity or its authenticity or its judicial correctness, but it is brought here as if it had been originated in some committee or upon briefs of counsel or upon mere pleading without an intervening adjudication.

I maintain that is unnecessary in these cases, or, if it is necessary in these cases, it is equally necessary in every action of ejectment that is brought to try the title to a tract of land, it makes no difference where it comes from. If I could discern that there was any public necessity for this, if in the past experience of this country it could be demonstrated that causes failed of justice because the courts below were incompetent to try them, and then if I could anticipate that we are organizing a court of five judges who will be incompetent to try the case, so incompetent that their adjudication does not make any impression of a prima facie nature upon the merits of the controversy, then I might be induced to support the amendment, but otherwise I think I can not.

I repeat, sir, that the effect of this will be, whatever the purpose is, to transfer all the important litigation in respect of all these Spanish and Mexican grants to the city of Washington and to have them retried here from the ground up, not merely upon the evidence that was taken in the court below, but upon such new evidence as the parties see proper to bring before the Supreme Court.

I think that is rather a broad invitation to men of distinguished ability to go into the Supreme Court of the United States and get the control and trial of the land grants in all of these great Territories to the west of us. And, Mr. President, it is an injustice to the local bar. There are just as good lawyers, perhaps, out in the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico and in the States of Colorado and Nevada as there are in Washington. Nevertheless, after they have expended all of their labor upon a case, and after these five judges have adjudicated it, and after they have had an almost undefined sweep of testimony heretofore taken before surveyors-general and commissions and the like, after they have had the equitable right and the enlarged and extended equitable power to reach out for all manner of evidence that has heretofore been taken without any controversy about any tract of this land and the whole matter has been settled by a decree in equity in the court below, it comes here and is to be tried de novo.

There was a practice in admiralty which had its own peculiar foundation in reason which enabled the Supreme Court of the United States to bring in new evidence for the purpose of determining what was the right of the matter between libellants and defendants or intervenors in admiralty courts, but that was a peculiar practice in admiralty, and I have not heard of its existing in any equity cause or any common-law cause in any court.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why, Mr. President, does the Senator mean to say that he does not know that every appeal in equity to the Supreme Court of the United States opens every question in the cause, fact as well as law?

Mr. MORGAN. But not to permit new evidence to be taken.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Ah, that is the very addition which, from the experience of the Supreme Court of the United States in the California land cases, the whole committee for the last ten years, including Judge Thurman and Judge Davis and all the great lights on the other side of the Chamber, who were chairmen of that committee, thought indispensable to the safety of the settler and of the United States against these enormous claims.

Mr. MORGAN. It is no more indispensable in that case than it is in every equity case, whether it involves title to land or title to personality or what not, or the enforcement of a trust or any other thing that falls within equity jurisdiction. If we are to put that provision into this bill to enable the Supreme Court of the United States to decide these causes upon evidence de novo, original testimony taken in that court after the parties had announced themselves ready for trial and had closed the matter in the court below, there is no reason why we should not extend the rule so as to include every equity cause that comes to the Supreme Court of the United States.

It is not to be assumed that injustice is going to be done in these land cases in the courts below, any more than it will be done in cases involving trusts or the administration of trusts or in cases falling within the equity jurisdiction of inferior courts, it makes no difference of what description they may be. There is no reason for supposing, not a reason that can be stated for supposing that the court below is going to be imposed upon in these land-grant cases any more than there is for supposing that the court below, the circuit court of the United States, for instance, will be imposed upon in an equity cause that may arise within its jurisdiction. But the logic of the position taken by the Senator from Vermont would compel him as chairman of the Judiciary Committee to make a general provision by law applicable to all equity causes whereby the Supreme Court of the United States might open the cases de novo, which it has not now the right to do.

Very true, Mr. President, when an appeal is brought from a circuit court of the United States to the Supreme Court the case stands upon the record as if no opinion had been pronounced except the weight of the conclusion of the court below upon matters of doubt. The Supreme Court always gives the benefit of the doubt to the court below. In a case, for instance, where a jury has been called in a court of equity, as may be done, and the facts submitted for the finding of the jury have been embodied in the record and a verdict thereupon pronounced, the Supreme Court of the United States in consideration of that case upon an appeal would not set aside the verdict of that jury and disregard it unless it was a plain case of the abuse of power by the jury or a plain case of a mistake of the facts, and even then the court would find itself very much embarrassed in undertaking to set aside the verdict of a jury. So in regard to disputed facts found in the record, where the evidence is conflicting and where it is not very clear, the decision reached by the court below is always regarded upon appeal by the Supreme Court as being a decision in favor of the truth, and the Supreme Court will not reverse and overturn that decision unless it feels constrained to do so by the weight of testimony that it can not avoid.

Now, in this bill no jury trial is provided for at all that I see, and that is one of the defects of the bill. If there is any case that can arise in any court in the United States where the benefit of a jury trial upon the facts of the case is demanded, where the jury can have the benefit of looking at the witnesses who are called to confront them and have twelve honest men to determine upon their credibility, it is the class of cases to which this bill relates. But there is no jury trial provided for here. On the contrary, all the ordinary instrumentalities of ascertaining the truth are utterly discarded by this bill, and after the court below, whether with a jury or without a jury, has gone on to ascertain and determine the facts, and perhaps after the witnesses themselves who testified are dead and gone, the case being brought here any time within three years upon an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States after the decision, the whole case stands open upon the record, just as if no judicial court had ever passed upon its merits.

Mr. President, it will take a strong case of apparent necessity in reaching the demands and decrees of justice to cause me to vote for a proposition like that, which keeps a case entirely untried, entirely open, after it has passed through all the expensive procedure of the court below, when it gets to the Supreme Court of the United States. No case will ever be tried of any consequence outside of the Supreme Court of the United States under this bill. It is a bill to provide for the control of causes upon evidence taken in the first instance in the Supreme Court of the United States. That is the object of it, the evident purpose of it, and I repeat it will take a strong statement to induce me to vote for it, and then I should be under serious apprehensions that the law was going to be abused, that the injustice of long delay would be visited upon those litigants who are unable to bear the expense of coming here and hiring counsel, after they had gained their cases in the court below, to stand by them and see that they are not broken up and destroyed and all the labor they have done thrown away by some new kink put in the case by some eminent counsel in Washington City.

What is the condition of a man who is fighting one of those Spanish grants out there, who has, as was stated the other day, reared his family upon that soil, who has been there for twenty or thirty years, but who can not plead the right of prescription, who has accumulated around him the fruit of toil, who has fought against the desert and the winds, and who has maintained himself to a degree that he can support his family there? He is sued by one of claimants. He defends his case at home; he can employ counsel there cheaper than he can in Washington City. He maintains his defense, the case comes up here and it all stands open, and the plaintiff in the action, the owner of a great land grant, the corporation or the syndicate—for the country is full of them—begins to summon witnesses here and examine them in the Supreme Court of the United States or before some commissioner.

The Supreme Court of the United States can not stop the business of this country to go in and give a trial de novo to every case that comes before it of this character. It can not sit and hear the witnesses sworn and examined and their credibility tested by cross-examination, as is done in the courts below. It can not summon a jury, perhaps for the purpose of assisting it in its deliberations and passing upon the honesty and integrity and credibility and fairness of the witnesses who are brought here. But this man must have the case tried a second time from the root, and the testimony which will be taken must be taken under some commission issued by the Supreme Court to some commissioner to have answers made to the questions or to take depositions. The man finds himself in the power of the appellant. Having beaten him in the court below, he finds himself now in the power of the appellant, and he must come here and hire lawyers at great expense merely to try the case that before that time has been tried by five judges that we appoint here at enormous salaries. So I object to this amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator from Vermont informs me that no question is raised concerning a lot of land held by an undisputed title. Who knows that it is an undisputed title? The tenant holds that it is, but section 6 says:

That it shall and may be lawful for any person or persons or corporation, or their legal representatives, claiming lands within the limits of the territory derived by the United States from the Republic of Mexico and now embraced within the Territories of New Mexico, Wyoming, Arizona, or Utah, or within the States of Nevada or of Colorado—

It shall be lawful for any person—to present a petition, in writing, to the said court in the State or Territory where said land is situated and where the said court holds its sessions, etc.

So I see no limitation, I see nothing provided for here which justifies what the Senator says. Whoever is in possession, and however long he may have been in possession, if a stranger comes there and sets up an adverse claim he must go into a defense, to a lawsuit. But we are told that the small holders are protected by section 16, on page 21, which says not the holders of only 160 acres shall be left unprotected, but that the surveyor shall make a resurvey of such tracts and that the surveyor "shall return with his survey the name or names of all persons so found to be in possession, with a proper description of the tract in the possession of each as shown by the survey, and the proofs furnished to him of such possession." Then—

Upon receipt of such survey and proofs the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall cause careful investigation to be made in such manner as he shall deem necessary for the ascertainment of the truth in respect of such claim and occupation, and if satisfied upon such investigation that the claimant comes within the provisions of this section, he shall cause patents to be issued to the parties so found to be in possession for the tracts respectively claimed by them.

Then it provides further:

That no person shall be entitled to confirmation of, or to patent for, more than one tract in his own right by virtue of this section.

And it is provided further:

That this section shall not apply to any city lot, town lot, village lot, farm lot, or pasture lot held under a grant from any corporation or town the claim to which may fall within the provisions of section 9 of this act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It provides for all those being taken in a lump to save expense. And while I am up, Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator that if he had done me the grace to read on page 7 two or three lines further down in section 6 than he did—he got to lines 11 and 12 and there stopped—he would have seen that it adds:

And which have not become complete and perfect, in every such case to present a petition, etc.

Mr. TELLER. I would ask the Senator what he means by "complete and perfect." I have had some experience in that question and I do not know what the words mean.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is the very question in issue, whether the title "has become complete and perfect."

Mr. EDMUNDS. This language is borrowed almost literally, and I do not know but literally, from about the first act that Congress ever passed in regard to Louisiana, the first territory acquired from France, in providing a court of land commissioners to try land titles down there and perfect those that were not perfect, and providing that those who had what they claimed to be good titles need not be obliged to come in, but the people who were appealing to the Government for political grace and political justice in the sense of having got a right which had not yet given them a perfect title, like entering lands under our land laws before the man has proved up and finished the perfecting of his claim, then his claim is not complete and perfect, and Congress, I think in the very first act, used in substance the same language, so as to leave the people who were the owners of titles which they were willing to regard as perfect derived from the former government not to be obliged to come in.

It is like (to take what may be an impossible illustration) the case of Canada being annexed to the United States, and we provided in the treaty of annexation that all the land titles in Canada should be respected, and as to those that had not become perfect under the Canadian Government they should be made perfect by the United States just as they would have been by the British or Canadian Government if the annexation had not taken place. To hold that every owner of land or lots in the city of Montreal, every private owner who had a good title should be obliged to go through the courts again, would be extremely unjust, because the common law, the universal law, provides for all those; and it is only those who wish to get the help of the United States to make good a title which they admit by coming in is not good already, but which the United States are bound upon the principles of the treaty where we promised to do it and pledged our faith to do it, to make good, they being the people whose titles we agreed to make good if we found that they had a right.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator does not help me very much. I know very well that under the language of this section, after the title has been confirmed by act of Congress or otherwise finally decided upon by lawful authority, the people are not very likely to bring suit if the record shows that the matter has been already decided. But there are men in possession of lands here that they got from their fathers before them, whose titles have never been confirmed by an act of Congress nor have they ever received the approval of any court of justice.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The treaty itself confirms every title that was a good title under the Mexican Government.

Mr. HAWLEY. But here is an act which says that anybody may bring suit on his claim where the title is not perfect, and then the case is coming into court. The possessor may rest in perfect calmness and certainty that he has a good title, but here is an interloper coming in to say that he has a good title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not at all.

Mr. HAWLEY. The bill says any person claiming land may make his petition. Here is another thing I do not quite understand. It says:

Seventh. No confirmation shall in any case be made or patent issued for a greater quantity than 11 square leagues of land.

I do not know why that is in there. I can not imagine. It was the old-fashioned limitation to 11 leagues. It was the old fashion before 1824 for Spaniards to give very generous grants of land that they did not know much about, supposed to be worth but very little except for herders, and where a man to have anything at all must have a great area. Before 1824 grants of more than 11 leagues were perfectly in order under Spanish and Mexican law, but in 1824 I believe a limitation was made so that grants thereafter should not include more than 10 leagues, and taking that history, these grants being lawful before 1824, and the smaller grants afterwards, we agreed in the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo to guaranty whatever Spain and Mexico had done. Now we come in with a limitation not found in that treaty.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wish to say a word on the 11-league question, which does not come in here to be sure, but I may as well state what the committee have always thought about that.

It is to be borne in mind all the time in respect of the class of lands mentioned in this bill, as to which the Mexican and Spanish Governments had not given a good title, but only in respect of which inchoate rights or claims had begun and which had to appeal to the equity and justice of the Government under which the claim was made to perfect it, that in executing that duty under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo we felt that the United States would be perfectly justified in respect of these uncertain and inchoate, merely started claims, to limit them, as the Government of Spain and as the Government of Mexico would have had the duty and the right before the proceeding was completed and the title had become perfect to limit the amount of land that could go in that way. After a man had taken the first step to get a grant of 10,000 leagues, if you please, it would be perfectly competent for the king to change his regulations and provide that his officers should not confirm a grant of more than 11 leagues.

So in general the old Spanish laws provided that there should be limitations greater or smaller in all these grants, and of course in all of them that there should be a final confirmation by a tribunal appointed by the king, and having large authority, and being composed of very high officers, to see that the grant was not too large, that it did not crowd upon the Indians, that it did not defeat any other just right and squeeze off any settler—very proper and suitable regulations. Now, following the spirit of that, we have thought these laws in making those provisions should limit it to what the Mexicans did as soon as they got their independence and got established, that in no case should any grant be confirmed exceeding 11 square leagues. I think that is right.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Vermont if he can call the attention of the Senate to any orders of the kings of Spain limiting the grants.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I can not at this present moment, for I have not the book here.

Mr. TELLER. Can the Senator at any time?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think so.

Mr. TELLER. I venture to say the Senator will find that a very difficult problem. That matter was a matter of discretion with certain officers of the Crown, left entirely to them, and when they put a man in juridical possession that was the end of the controversy.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That made a perfect title.

Mr. TELLER. That made a perfect title, and that is the condition of all these lands in Arizona; that is a valid title, because the Supreme Court has declared that that was necessary, and the Government of the United States has never recognized any titles except those where there was juridical possession or a good excuse for not having the possession taken. There has been some exception where there have been depredations or Indian wars or something by reason of which the possession would not be taken by the grantee. Aside from that they have exacted always that possession should be taken.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Supreme Court has decided under the law that such a man had a good title, and the California land claim commission and the Louisiana commission and all the succession from the time we first obtained the Louisiana grant from France have given to everybody who proved that he had made his first start in good faith, although he had not his juridical possession, a perfect title, such as the former Government would have gone on and given if the sovereignty had not changed.

Mr. TELLER. That is true. Wherever they found that there was a condition of affairs where the Mexican Government or the Spanish Government would have completed the title where the steps were regular up to that point, they had to go on; but all the grants in California, in Arizona, and in New Mexico have been subject to revision of the United States, and the Supreme Court has never made any distinction between complete grants and incomplete grants. The Supreme Court has declared that it was not an interference with the right and not a violation of the treaty to require that the owners of complete titles, perfect titles, should submit the evidence of their titles to the tribunals established by the United States. A great many people believed that that was a violation of the treaty, where those who held a complete title and the grantee had taken every step that was required by the Mexican or Spanish Government, and would have been under the necessity of taking no further step, that that was an infringement of the terms of the treaty to require him to establish further his title. The Supreme Court said it was not; so that really there is no distinction between a completed and an uncompleted title, and those words in this bill mean nothing at all.

Mr. GIBSON. I inquire of the Senator from Vermont whether the provisions of this bill apply to all the claims within the territory acquired by the United States from Spain or France.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It applies to those within the Territories named and in the States named, but it does not apply to Louisiana.

Mr. GIBSON. It does not apply to Louisiana or Arkansas or Alabama or Florida.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to state that while it applies to claims in the State of Colorado, it is of no especial value because, I believe, every grant in that State has been confirmed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is only named because part of it is in the area derived from Mexico.

Mr. TELLER. I understand it is only because it is within the area we derived from Mexico.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the amendment be reported.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, section 9, line 10, after "United States," it is proposed to insert:

On any such appeal the Supreme Court shall retry the cause, as well the issues of fact as of law, and may take testimony in addition to that given in the court below, and may amend the record of the proceedings below as truth and justice may require; and on such retrial and hearing every question shall be open, and the decision of the Supreme Court thereon shall be final and conclusive.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PADDOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS].

Mr. WALTHALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON], who is now in the chair, is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. It has been arranged to exchange those pairs, and I vote "yea."

Mr. COKE (when Mr. WASHBURN's name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. FAULKNER. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. KENNA] is detained from the Senate by reason of sickness, and is paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT].

Mr. GEORGE. I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR].

Mr. MORGAN. I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS].

Mr. PADDOCK. I am informed by the friends of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS], with whom I am paired, that it will be agreeable to him if I vote on this question. I therefore vote "yea."

So the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will be resumed.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Private Land Claims was, in section 9, line 22, after the word "a," to strike out the word "concise" and insert "clear;" so as to make the clause read:

Upon the rendition of any judgment of the court confirming any claim it shall be the duty of the attorney of the United States to notify the Attorney-General, in writing, of such judgment, giving him a clear statement of the case and the points decided by the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, section 9, line 23, after the word "court," to insert:

Which statement shall be verified by the certificate of the presiding judge of said court; and in any case in which such statement shall not be received by the Attorney-General within sixty days next after the rendition of such judgment, the right of appeal on the part of the United States shall continue to exist until six months next after the receipt of such statement.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 10, line 1, after the word "confirmation," to strike out "rendered by said court;" in line 2, after the word "final," to strike out "either by the failure of the United States to appeal therefrom, or by its affirmance by the Supreme Court," and in line 4, after the word "court," to insert the words "in which the final decision shall be had;" so as to read:

SEC. 10. That whenever any decision of confirmation shall become final, the clerk of the court in which the final decision shall be had shall certify that fact to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, with a copy of the decree of confirmation, which shall plainly state the location, boundaries, and area of the tract confirmed, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary calls the attention of the Chair, who calls the attention of the Senator from Vermont, to an apparent omission in line 14; the word "the" should be inserted before the word "same."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; it should. I thank the Secretary very much.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The word "the" will be inserted, if there be no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Also, on page 13, section 10, line 24, the word "the" should be inserted before the word "same."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, that is true.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That change will be made.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Private Land Claims was, in section 10, line 41, after the word "court," to insert "in which the final decision was made;" so as to read:

At the expiration of the said ninety days the surveyor-general shall forward such survey, with the objections and proofs filed in support of or in opposition to such objections, and his report thereon, to the Commissioner of the General Land Office. Immediately upon receipt of any such survey, with or without objections thereto, the said Commissioner shall transmit the same, with all accompanying papers, to the court in which the final decision was made for its examination of the survey and of any objections and proofs that may have been filed, or shall be furnished.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 10, line 51, after the word "shall," to strike out "forthwith" and insert "as soon as may be;" so as to read:

When any survey is finally approved by the court it shall be returned to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who shall as soon as may be cause a patent to be issued thereon to the claimant.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 10, beginning in line 52, to strike out the following clause:

The Commissioner of the General Land Office shall also transmit to said court for its examination all surveys of private land claims, with the accompanying papers, in the States and Territories to which this act is applicable now pending in his office, together with all surveys of private land claims in said States and Territories heretofore confirmed which he shall hereafter receive, and the court shall have the same jurisdiction of such surveys as it has of surveys confirmed under the provisions of this act.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

One-half of the necessary expenses of making the survey and plat provided for in this section, and in respect of which a patent shall be ordered to be issued, shall be paid by the claimant or patentee, and shall be a lien on said land, which may be enforced by the sale of so much thereof as may be necessary for that purpose, after a default of payment thereof for six months next after the approval of such survey and plat; and no patent shall issue until such payment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 11, line 2, after the words "pasture lot," to strike out "held under a grant from any corporation or town" and insert "claimed directly or mediately under;" and in line 5, after the word "confirmation," to strike out "under this Government" and insert "by the United States;" so as to read:

That the provisions of this act shall extend to any city lot, town lot, village lot, farm lot, or pasture lot claimed directly or mediately under any grant which may be entitled to confirmation by the United States, for the establishment of a city, town, or village, by the Spanish or Mexican Government, or the lawful authorities thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read to the end of section 11.

Mr. PLUMB. I want to call attention to section 11, which has just been read. I spoke to the Senator from Vermont about it a few moments ago. It seems to me there are cases down in New Mexico which this section does not meet. It must be remembered that there are a very considerable number of persons who are in possession of small tracts of land which form villages in fact, but of which to require any burden of cost or to necessitate the employment of attorneys and going into court is of itself a very considerable obstruction. I doubt very much whether under this section all the cases would be met.

I also want to call attention to another section of the bill in connection with this in a moment, but in the mean while I will state that this section provides that the lawful authorities of the village may make proof for all the members, and that in the event of there being no lawful authorities, or where the land was originally granted to an individual, his claims shall be presented by or in the name of said individual or his legal representatives. I think there are villages in New Mexico practically occupying village grants, as known under the Spanish law, where there are no village authorities, and communal grants where there is no person and no arrangement whereby any person could be constituted to represent the community in a proceeding of this kind.

I made to the Senator from Vermont privately a moment ago a suggestion that in cases of this sort the court might be authorized to appoint a trustee or some other person in whose name this proceeding might be carried on in such a way as to be inexpensive, and yet at the same time to certainly result in the confirmation of the grant, with such other method of determining the individual holdings of each member of the community as might be necessary under all the circumstances. It is a power which the court has to exercise in a friendly way. I should very much hope that whatever court came to decide the duties devolved upon it by this bill, if it should ever become a law, would not feel that all of this character of people or any of them in point of fact held adverse to the United States in such a way as to require the court to look upon them with disfavor, or to do other than to give them the greatest possible assistance in obtaining their titles.

In connection with the eleventh section I desire to call attention to the fact that in section 16 a certain duty is devolved upon the deputy surveyor who may hereafter make surveys in these Territories, and upon the Commissioner of the General Land Office, which seems to be, if not in conflict with section 11, at the same time to provide a different remedy for what may be the same class of cases.

I know the Senator from Vermont is in entire sympathy with the general view which I have expressed about these people. A man who owns or claims to own a grant covering ten, fifteen, twenty, or fifty thousand acres of land can be safely left to take care of himself. They are not the people I have especially in mind about this legislation. Most of them have had the good fortune by means of their diligence heretofore not only to have their claims confirmed by act of Congress, but at the same time to get a great deal of land that they were never entitled to at all.

Mr. TELLER. Adjoining land.

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, as the Senator from Colorado says, some adjoining land.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will tell my friend that they have not had any confirmed by act of Congress for the last twelve years.

Mr. PLUMB. I understand that. There is one exception. Since I have been a member of this body, more than thirteen years, one claim amounting to about 50,000 acres was confirmed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not from the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. PLUMB. It was from the Committee on Private Land Claims. I think I am quite sure about that. I will look it up, however.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think I remember it. I was absent at that time. Very likely it was a correct claim.

Mr. PLUMB. I think so. At all events, in view of certain claims which have been confirmed, it could be said to be an indication of the justice of the claim from the fact that only about 50,000 acres were confirmed, as I now remember. But here are a class of people who went on these lands under the law of Mexico, or under the custom then prevailing, who occupied only the smallest tracts of land, a few acres in extent, and remained there generation after generation until now, and it would be a piece of infamy if the Congress of the United States in providing for the larger claims should in any wise so legislate as either to prevent any one of these holders of small tracts of land from getting possession and getting it practically without cost. If there may be any point over which doubts are to be resolved in this bill, I should be in favor as to these people of making it perfectly certain that there shall be no form of law and no strictness of ruling required of the court which shall in any way except any one of these people from obtaining in the quickest and cheapest possible way exactly what he is entitled to by reason of his long continued possession.

Mr. EDMUNDS obtained the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to ask him a question before he takes his seat? Let me ask him if he understands that this bill provides for any petition to be filed or presented by any other person than one claiming under a grant from Spain or Mexico.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not. It must be held under a grant, or, I understand, under such custom as would have entitled the person in the event jurisdiction had remained in Mexico to have received his title from that Government. But if it does not provide for a class of cases where they might not have been so entitled, then it ought in the case of these small landholders.

Mr. RANSOM. It provides for the small holders.

Mr. PLUMB. There are in the Rio Grande Valley below Albuquerque, and perhaps at various other points in that valley and at other points in other valleys of the Territory, a very considerable number of people who went upon the land under the condition of things then existing, expecting to get title, and who, whether they were in the exact line of the law of Mexico in regard to the acquisition of title or not, have the strongest possible claim upon our sense of justice.

Mr. MORGAN. The point I wanted to call the attention of the Senator to—

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator will pardon me, as I have only three minutes and I want to reply to the Senator from Kansas now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont has been recognized by the Chair and declines to yield.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to respond to my friend from Kansas that I agree with his sentiments entirely, and I think I can convince him when I have ten minutes of time or less, and everybody else, that the two sections to which he has referred do exactly the thing that he wishes to do, and in the cheapest possible way; and we framed the eleventh section and the sixteenth section with that view. The eleventh section applies to what was called a communal grant; that was a grant to a settlement which was to set up a town and keep a town, and annexed to that town was a vast common of pasturage, going to a mountain, sometimes taking in probably 100 square leagues. In some of those cases the towns and communes have long since entirely disappeared, and the original settlers and their children have gone away and taken up other settlements, or died, and nobody knows what has become of them.

There came before the Committee on Private Land Claims before we framed these two provisions a very large claim, a communal claim represented by the kind of counsel the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has so strongly spoken of, very eminent counsel, claiming that they had found the heirs of some of these ancient communes and that those heirs would represent the whole commune, and they had a grant from the heirs, and they wanted us to confirm this original communal grant from the King of Spain or the Mexican Republic, whichever it was, and all the outlying pasture lands, amounting in that instance to hundreds of square leagues. I remember that Judge Thurman, I think it was, was the chairman of the committee at that time, or Judge Davis, one or the other of them, and when he came to find out exactly what the point was, the eminent counsel got very small comfort, because we did not intend that somebody should go and hunt up some name to give a grant for a commune where there was nobody settled now, and buy up that from the supposed heir, prima facie the heir because of the same name as a person who had lived there a great while, and come in and get Congress to confirm that vast tract of land for the speculator. We therefore made the provision of section 11.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont will please suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock has arrived, and the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will my friend from Maine give me one minute?

Mr. FRYE. I ask that the unfinished business be informally laid aside until the Senator from Vermont finishes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for only two minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The title of the unfinished business will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 3738) to place the American merchant marine, engaged in foreign trade, upon an equality with that of other nations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business will be informally laid aside by unanimous consent, and the Senator from Vermont will proceed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So we required by section 11 that these communal grants should be represented by an existing commune; that is, the town, city, or village that occupied the original location, so as not to let a speculator come in and take up the abandoned villages, of which there are a great many in these hundreds of years.

Mr. TELLER. Suppose they are not incorporated?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then to provide for those actual descendants of that commune, or anybody else who has settled where there was the commune, or settled anywhere else and has been in for twenty years, the sixteenth section comes in and gives him a short way out without proving any claim at all except his possession.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will allow me, I suggest to him that he will have to reform section 16 somewhat, I think. It provides "that in township surveys hereafter to be made," etc. It does not apply to those cases where surveys have already been made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If there is any fault of that kind in structure it is subject to correction.

Mr. TELLER. I ask the Senator to look at that. Certainly it ought to include former surveys.

Mr. PLUMB. It leaves them to the accident, too, of being discovered by the county surveyor.

Mr. TELLER. There ought to be some way in which they may be heard.

Mr. PLUMB. The surveyor ought to see these people and proffer them title, and take the most careful and detailed means to see that all of them are brought into court, or wherever else it is necessary, at the expense of the Government if need be, in order that they may get their title long before the cupidity of any outsider may be attracted to their holdings.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is exactly our provision in respect of these small settlers up to 160 acres. It does not require them to prove any title or go to the trouble of proving it in court. They go to the surveyor, the deputy surveyor, or Commissioner of the General Land Office, just like a homesteader on a pre-emption and prove up their claim. If there is anything further that is wanted in that section, which I did not draw myself, in respect of these actual settlers on their small holdings, no matter whose claim it is, I am most glad to help them do it.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to suggest to the Senator that as the sixteenth section is now drawn it only affects those hereafter discovered by new surveys, and it ought to be so amended as to take in all this class of people.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Who are actual settlers?

Mr. PLUMB. Who are actual settlers living on this land. As I said to the Senator, many of these people are ignorant; many of them do not speak our language, and they know nothing about their title. Some of them have been there from time immemorial and they ought to be protected in their small holdings.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Most certainly.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President—

Mr. DOLPH. I ask the Senator to yield to me while I submit an amendment which I shall propose to section 14 of the bill, and which I submit now by way of suggestion to the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read and printed.

Mr. MORGAN. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. Strike out all of section 14 after the word "thereupon," in line 9 of the section, and insert:

Such claimants or their legal representatives shall be entitled to receive as full consideration for the lands so released the sum of $1.25 per acre, which sum shall be paid to him or them by the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, upon the certificate of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. REAGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I want to present two amendments to the land bill, and I ask that they may be printed by the time it comes up again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be received and printed.

Mr. REAGAN. I expect they had better be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. Amend section 13, page 17, by inserting after the word "perfect," in line 12, the following:

But no mere concession by either of said Governments of the right to obtain title to the land claimed, or survey of the same, with the conditions on which it was to be obtained unfulfilled, shall be deemed such a title as should be so confirmed, as where there has been no occupation or survey of the land and no payment of the public dues necessary to obtain the title to the same.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask that the other amendment I propose to offer be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend section 16, page 21, lines 7, 8, and 9, by striking out the words "residing thereon as his home, of any tract of land of not exceeding 160 acres in such township, for twenty years" and in lieu thereof to insert:

Of any tract of land, cultivating the same or some part thereof, not exceeding 160 acres, in any such township for twenty years next preceding the time of making such survey without title to said lands, and any person, his ancestors or grantors who shall have had like peaceable, uninterrupted, adverse, and bona fide possession of any tract of land of whatever size, cultivating the same or some part thereof in any such township with boundaries known and recognized in the neighborhood where such land may be situated for a like period of twenty years, though there be no written title therefor.

UNITED STATES ELECTION LAWS.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 11045) to amend and supplement the election laws of the United States, and to provide for the more efficient enforcement of such laws, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. FRYE. I ask that what is known as the House election bill, which has just been sent over to the Senate, may lie on the table until the return of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. He desired that to be done when he went away.

The bill (H. R. 11045) to amend and supplement the election laws of the United States, and to provide for the more efficient enforcement of such laws, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

TREASURY NOTES—SILVER BULLION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a conference report, which I will ask to have read and lie over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5381) directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments to said bill and agree to the following in the nature of a substitute: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to purchase, from time to time, silver bullion to the aggregate amount of 4,500,000 ounces, or so much thereof as may be offered in each month, at the market price thereof, not exceeding $1 for 371.25 grains of pure silver, and to issue in payment for such purchases of silver bullion Treasury notes of the United States to be prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury, in such form and of such denominations, not less than $1 nor more than $1,000, as he may prescribe, and a sum sufficient to carry into effect the provisions of this act is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

"SEC. 2. That the Treasury notes issued in accordance with the provisions of this act shall be redeemable on demand, in coin, at the Treasury of the United States or at the office of any assistant treasurer of the United States, and when so redeemed may be reissued; but no greater or less amount of such notes shall be outstanding at any time than the cost of the silver bullion, and the standard silver dollars coined therefrom, then held in the Treasury purchased by such notes; and such Treasury notes shall be a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract, and shall be receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues, and when so received may be reissued; and such notes, when held by any national-banking association, may be counted as a part of its lawful reserve. That upon demand of the holder of any of the Treasury notes herein provided for the Secretary of the Treasury shall, under such regulations as he may prescribe, redeem such notes in gold or silver coin, at his discretion, it being the established policy of the United States to maintain the two metals on a parity with each other upon the present legal ratio, or such ratio as may be provided by law.

"SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall each month coin 2,000,000 ounces of the silver bullion purchased under the provisions of this act into standard silver dollars until the 1st day of July, 1891, and after that time he shall coin of the silver bullion purchased under the provisions of this act as much as may be necessary to provide for the redemption of the Treasury notes herein provided for, and any gain or seigniorage arising from such coinage shall be accounted for and paid into the Treasury.

"SEC. 4. That the silver bullion purchased under the provisions of this act shall be subject to the requirements of existing law and the regulations of the mint service governing the methods of determining the amount of pure silver contained, and the amount of charges or deductions, if any, to be made.

"SEC. 5. That so much of the act of February 28, 1878, entitled 'An act to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar and to restore its legal-tender character,' as requires the monthly purchase and coinage of the same into silver dollars of not less than $2,000,000 nor more than $4,000,000 worth of silver bullion, is hereby repealed.

"SEC. 6. That upon the passage of this act the balances standing with the Treasurer of the United States to the respective credits of national banks for deposits made to redeem the circulating notes of such banks, and all deposits thereafter received for like purpose, shall be covered into the Treasury as a miscellaneous receipt, and the Treasurer of the United States shall redeem from the general cash in the Treasury the circulating notes of said banks which may come into his possession subject to redemption; and upon the certificate of the Comptroller of the Currency that such notes have been received by him and that they have been destroyed and that no new notes will be issued in their place, reimbursement of their amount shall be made to the Treasurer, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, from an appropriation hereby created, to be known as 'National-bank notes: Redemption account,' but the provisions of this act shall not apply to the deposits received under section 3 of the act of June 20, 1874, requiring every national bank to keep in lawful money with the Treasurer of the United States a sum equal to 5 per cent, of its circulation, to be held and used for the redemption of its circulating notes; and the balance remaining of the deposits so covered shall, at the close of each month, be reported on the monthly public debt statement as debt of the United States bearing no interest.

"SEC. 7. That this act shall take effect thirty days from and after its passage." And the Senate agree to the same.

JOHN SHERMAN,
JNO. P. JONES,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
E. H. CONGER,
J. H. WALKER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the conference report be printed, and that there be printed in connection with it the original House bill and the Senate amendments followed by the conference report, so that the whole action can be seen at a glance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the original House bill, the Senate amendments, and the conference report will be printed consecutively as one document.

Mr. SHERMAN. I give notice that to-morrow morning I propose to call up the conference report.

Mr. VEST. At what time do I understand the Senator from Ohio to say he expected to call up the conference report?

Mr. SHERMAN. To-morrow morning.

Mr. DANIEL. May I inquire how many copies will be printed under the order just made?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The usual number, 1,900 copies.

Mr. DANIEL. Will that be sufficient?

Mr. SHERMAN. It will be sufficient until the report is acted upon. If it should be adopted, then as a matter of course we can have as many copies printed as we desire.

MOBILE AND DAUPHIN ISLAND RAILROAD AND HARBOR COMPANY.

Mr. VEST. I desire to ask unanimous consent to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which Senate bill 3751 was passed by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title of the bill will be stated. The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 3751) to grant to the Mobile and Dauphin Island Railroad and Harbor Company a right to trestle across the shoal water between Cedar Point and Dauphin Island.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been sent to the House of Representatives, the motion to reconsider will be accompanied by a request to recall the bill, if there be no objection.

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir; I was about to add that the vote be reconsidered and the House requested to return the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As soon as the bill is in the possession of the Senate the motion to reconsider can be made.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 1064) granting a pension to Margaret E. Adamson; and A bill (H. R. 9056) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, and for other purposes.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. FRYE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3738) to place the American merchant marine engaged in the foreign carrying trade upon an equality with that of other nations.

Mr. GIBSON. I offer a substitute for the bill. The substitute I offer is Senate bill No. 3739, reported by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] from the Committee on Commerce. To that bill I propose to add several sections. The last section of the bill is No. 9, and I propose to add three more sections, section 10, section 11, and section 12, and I ask that the sections to be added to the bill be read. I suppose it is not necessary to have the bill itself read.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to hear the whole of it read. I have not heard it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON in the chair). The Chair understands the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana to be in the nature of a substitute, striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting:

Mr. GIBSON. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized and empowered to enter into contracts for a term not less than five nor more than ten years' duration, with American citizens, for the carrying of mails on American steam-ships, between the ports of the United States and such ports in foreign countries, the Dominion of Canada excepted, as in his judgment will best subserve and promote the postal and commercial interests of the United States. Said contracts shall be made with the lowest responsible bidder for the performance of said service on each route, and the Postmaster-General shall have the right to reject all bids not in his opinion reasonable for the attaining of the purposes named.

Sec. 2. That before making any contract for carrying ocean mails in accordance with this act the Postmaster-General shall give public notice by advertising once a week, for three months, in such daily papers as he shall select in each of the cities of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, New Orleans, St. Louis, Charleston, Norfolk, Savannah, Galveston, and Mobile, and when the proposed service is to be on the Pacific Ocean, then in San Francisco, Tacoma, and Portland. Such notice shall describe the route, the time when such contract will be made, the duration of the same, the size of the steamers to be used, the number of trips a year, the times of sailing, and the time when the service shall commence, which shall not be more than three years after the contract shall be let. The details of the mode of advertising and letting such contracts shall be conducted in the manner prescribed in chapter 8 of Title XLIX of the Revised Statutes, for the letting of inland mail contracts, so far as the same shall be applicable to the ocean mail service.

Sec. 3. That the vessels employed in the mail service under the provisions of this act shall be American-built steam-ships, owned and officered by American citizens, in conformity with the existing laws, and upon each departure from the United States the following proportion of the crew shall be citizens of the United States, to wit: During the first two years of such contract for carrying the mails, one-fourth thereof; during the next three succeeding years, one-third thereof; and during the remaining time of the continuance of such contract, at least one-half thereof; and shall be constructed after the latest and most approved types, with all the modern improvements and appliances for ocean steamers. They shall be divided into four classes. The first class shall be iron or steel screw steam-ships capable of maintaining a speed of 20 knots an hour at sea in ordinary weather and of a gross registered tonnage of not less than 8,000 tons. No vessel except of said first class shall be accepted for said mail service under the provisions of this act between the United States and Great Britain. The second class shall be iron or steel steam-ships capable of maintaining a speed of 16 knots an hour at sea in ordinary weather and of a gross registered tonnage of not less than 5,000 tons. The third class shall be iron or steel steam-ships capable of maintaining a speed of 14 knots an hour at sea in ordinary weather and of a gross registered tonnage of not less than 2,500 tons. The fourth class shall be iron or steel or wooden steam-ships capable of maintaining a speed of 12 knots an hour at sea in ordinary weather and of a gross registered tonnage of not less than 1,500 tons. It shall be stipulated in the contract or contracts to be entered into for the said mail service that said vessels may carry passengers with their baggage in addition to said mails and may do all ordinary business done by steam-ships.

Sec. 4. That all steam-ships of the first, second, and third classes employed as above and hereafter built shall be constructed with particular reference to prompt and economical conversion into auxiliary naval cruisers, and according to plans and specifications to be agreed upon by and between the owners and the Secretary of the Navy, and they shall be of sufficient strength and stability to carry and sustain the working and operation of at least four effective rifled cannon of a caliber of not less than 6 inches, and shall be of the highest rating known to maritime commerce. And all vessels of said three classes heretofore built and so employed shall, before they are accepted for the mail service herein provided for, be thoroughly inspected by a competent naval officer or constructor detailed for that service by the Secretary of the Navy; and such officer shall report, in writing, to the Secretary of the Navy, who shall transmit said report to the Postmaster-General; and no such vessel not approved by the Secretary of the Navy as suitable for the service required shall be employed by the Postmaster-General as provided for in this act.

Sec. 5. That the rate of compensation to be paid for such ocean mail service of the said first-class ships shall not exceed the sum of $5 a mile and for the second-class ships $3 a mile, by the shortest practicable route, for each outward voyage; for the third-class ships shall not exceed $1.50 a mile, and for the fourth-class ships $1 a mile for the actual number of miles required by the Post-Office Department to be traveled on each outward-bound voyage: Provided, That in the case of failure from any cause to perform the regular voyages stipulated for in said contracts, or any of them, a pro rata deduction shall be made from the compensation on account of such omitted voyage or voyages; and that suitable fines and penalties may be imposed for delays or irregularities in the due performance of service according to the contract, to be determined by the Postmaster-General: Provided further, That no steam-ship so employed and so paid for carrying the United States mails shall receive any other bounty or subsidy from the Treasury of the United States.

Sec. 6. That upon each of said vessels the United States shall be entitled to have transported, free of charge, a mail messenger, whose duty it shall be to receive, sort, take in charge, and deliver the mails to and from the United States, and who shall be provided with suitable room for the accommodation of himself and the mails.

Sec. 7. That officers of the United States Navy may volunteer for service on said mail vessels, and when accepted by the contractor or contractors may be assigned to such duty by the Secretary of the Navy whenever in his opinion such assignment can be made without detriment to the service, and while in said employment they shall receive furlough pay from the Government, and such other compensation from the contractor or contractors as may be agreed upon by the parties: Provided, That they shall only be required to perform such duties as appertain to the merchant service.

Sec. 8. That said vessels shall take, as cadets or apprentices, one American-born boy under twenty-one years of age for each 1,000 tons gross register and one for each majority fraction thereof, who shall be educated in the duties of seamanship, rank as petty officers, and receive such pay for their services as may be reasonable.

Sec. 9. That such steamers may be taken and used by the United States as transports or cruisers, upon payment to the owners of the fair actual value of the same at the time of the taking, and if there shall be a disagreement as to the fair actual value between the United States and the owners, then the same shall be determined by two impartial appraisers, one to be appointed by each of said parties, they at the same time selecting a third, who shall act in said appraisal in case the two shall fail to agree.

Sec. 10. That for the period of ten years from and after the passage of this act so many of the various provisions of Title XLVIII of the Revised Statutes of the United States, entitled "Regulation of Commerce and Navigation," embraced in chapters 1 and 9 of said title, and from section 4131 to section 4305, both inclusive, as prohibit or restrict citizens of the United States from purchasing ships built in other countries, and to be used in the foreign carrying trade, or which impose taxes, burdens, or restrictions on foreign-built ships employed in the foreign carrying trade, when owned by American citizens, which are not imposed on ships built in the United States, be, and are hereby, suspended, and it shall be lawful thereafter for the period aforesaid for all citizens of the United States to buy ships built in whole or in part in any foreign country, and have them registered as ships of the United States for employment in the foreign carrying trade, and when so purchased and registered and employed in the foreign carrying trade such ships shall be entitled to all the rights and subject only to the same regulations as are provided by law for the government and management of ships built wholly within the United States and controlled by citizens thereof.

Sec. 11. That this bill shall not be so construed as to permit any ship built in any other country, and purchased and registered by citizens of the United States, as provided in the preceding section, to be employed in the coasting trade or in the mail service, foreign or domestic, or engaged in the transportation of freight or passengers between ports of the United States.

Sec. 12. That section 17 of the act of June 25, 1884, entitled "An act to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American carrying trade, and for other purposes," be amended so as to read as follows: "When a vessel is built, equipped, and fitted out in the United States, by or for an American citizen for employment in the foreign trade, wholly or partly of foreign materials on which duties have been paid, there shall be allowed on such vessel, when completed ready for service, a drawback equal in amount to the duty paid on such materials, outfit, and equipment, to be ascertained under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury." It is further hereby provided that all supplies, materials, and outfits used by all American vessels while employed in the foreign trade shall also be entitled to a drawback of the full amount of the duties paid on them, without retaining in the Treasury any rebate or reduction and without any fees being called for and collected by the Treasury officers who calculate the drawback. The drawback here provided for shall be paid back, out of the Treasury, under such regulations as shall be made by the Secretary of the Treasury. But in view of the practical difficulty to repairers of vessels, and also to the builders of small vessels availing of the privilege hereby granted when using such materials and supplies in small quantities, it shall be the duty of the Treasury to give to such builders and owners every facility for collecting drawbacks in small amounts which is consistent with the protection of the revenue from fraud or smuggling.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON].

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, I have not had opportunity to study this bill and shall therefore not attempt a discussion of its details, but I desire to submit a few remarks on the policy indicated by the bill.

I agree most heartily with the purpose that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce has, of trying to build up anew the merchant marine of the United States, but I do not agree with the policy of the bill presented by the committee. We have adopted a revenue policy that is approaching the prohibition of imports into this country. I think we may safely assume that if we are to trade with other countries, either by our own ships or by the help of ships of foreign countries, we must buy as well as sell commodities. That is the law of commerce in that respect. We can not expect to build up an ocean commerce between our country and other countries when by the policy of our legislation we destroy or go far towards destroying the existence of an international commerce.

If we desire to have commerce with other nations we should adopt such a policy as will invite the interchange of products; otherwise no amount of Government subsidy to steam-ships or other vessels can give us a commerce. It may give us ships, but it can not give us commerce. The amount of subsidy which it is proposed by this bill to give to a ship is very small compared with a great commerce. If by our revenue system we levy duties so as to increase the cost of material and of the elements of manufactured fabrics largely above what they can be made for in other countries, we can not expect to sell them, because other countries can undersell us.

A few years ago I had a very interesting conversation with an eminent citizen of Peru, and inquired of him why it was that we could not have fuller and freer commercial intercourse with Peru and the other South American States. He said there were two difficulties in the way: That under our revenue system when our merchants sent goods to Peru they had to pay for them in money, because, so far as their copper and wool were concerned, two of their large exports, they could not bring them here for sale. But he said when an English merchant ship went into their ports loaded with a cargo of merchandise they could exchange their copper, their wool, their hides, and other commodities of their country for this merchandise, and the English ship would have a cargo in and a cargo out.

So, it was an encouragement to the ship-owner by giving him a cargo both ways, and an encouragement to commerce by carrying the raw material from Peru to Great Britain, there to be manufactured and to be returned in manufactured fabrics. He said that, so far as the personal feelings and wishes of the people of Peru were concerned, they would undoubtedly prefer to have commercial intercourse and relations with the people of the United States, but that commerce, like money, had no patriotism in it; it would go where it could buy cheapest and where it could sell dearest; and that under those conditions they were unable to trade with the United States.

Now, what was said by that gentleman in reference to Peru may be said with reference to Mexico and all the Central and South American States. They can not trade with us because we can not take their articles of export. There are some things that we take. It may be said, in answer to what I have said, that we import coffee and hides free of duty; but while we do that we can export nothing, or substantially nothing—so little that it does not amount to anything—and we have to pay for those things in money.

I stop at this point for another view. We, in this country to-day, have capital enough invested in manufacturing establishments and machinery for manufacturing purposes, enough in operation not only to supply our own country, but to go far towards supplying the wants as to cotton and woolen goods and iron and steel and their fabrics certainly of all the American countries to the south of us. So we have that great inducement to a freer and more liberal commercial intercourse with those countries, not now being able to trade with them, however, because of our revenue system, which is making partially a Chinese wall around this country.

The machinery for manufacturing can not be run continuously through the year. Hence it is that we hear frequently of manufacturing establishments closing down or running on half time because there is no market for their products. This works a great injury to the capital invested in these establishments and relatively a much greater injury to the operatives engaged in these establishments, who, when they are stopped from work, are deprived of the means of supporting themselves and their families, and the result is suffering, misery, and misfortune to large classes of people. These things are happening almost continuously in some one or other part of this country and in some one or other branch of business, taking its round pretty much with all of them. We have offered such high inducements to the investment of capital in manufactures by the high rates of duties we have imposed upon imports as to induce an unusual and unnecessary investment of capital in manufacturing establishments, and thus we are working injury to capital, injury to labor, and injury to the commerce of the country.

If we expect to secure a mercantile marine we must make provision for building up commerce with other countries; we must make more free and more liberal our intercourse with other countries. Instead of adopting a protective and prohibitive tariff we must adopt a revenue tariff as low as will support the Government economically administered. When we have done that, we can then manufacture articles greatly cheaper than we can now manufacture them under the present revenue laws and we shall have markets for those articles; they can then go into the markets of the world, and especially into the markets of Mexico and Central and South America in competition with the manufactures of other countries.

When we do that, Mr. President, we shall have done what no subsidy can do. We shall have invited ships to carry our commerce, for whenever we have the commerce to carry the ships are sure to come forward and carry it, whether they be our own ships or other ships.

Now, I have one other suggestion to make in this connection. If we desire to do the ocean carrying for our own country, a wise policy would suggest that we authorize American capitalists to buy foreign-built ships if they can do so cheaper than they can build them at home, and when they have bought the ships the capital of our citizens gets the profit of operating those ships and our country gets the profit of doing its own carrying trade. I have not looked at the tables lately, but we, I believe, are sacrificing something like a hundred million dollars a year; that is, we are allowing that much money to be paid by our merchants to foreign-built ships that might be saved to our own people if they were permitted to purchase ships which they may not be able to build.

But, Mr. President, I do not think, with our present revenue laws, we can expect capitalists in this country to go largely into the purchase of foreign ships, because of the fact that our commerce is crippled by those revenue laws so that we can not hope to build up a foreign commerce so long as the idea of prohibiting commerce prevails in this country. I may not be able to see as clearly as others, but to my mind this Chinese-wall business is one of the most extraordinary political blunders that an intelligent people ever made.

Here, in an eminently progressive country, in a country exporting some $500,000,000 worth of agricultural products annually, for which there is no consumption at home, a country capable of manufacturing twice as much as our own people can consume, a country situated on the half-way station between the active, energetic, intelligent, commercial populations of Western Europe and the teeming populations of Asia, that we should adopt a policy that isolates us commercially from the rest of the world has seemed to me something so extraordinary that it is difficult to comprehend why it should be done. I can only see one reason for it, and that is a deliberate purpose to sacrifice the interests of the country at large in order to promote the interests of a small portion of our own people and the purpose of promoting the interests of a small portion of our own people at the expense of the whole people, who might be more prosperous and be greatly benefited by a freer commercial intercourse with the rest of the world.

I do not know whether we ought to hope for a change of this policy. It seems that our country is committed to a line of class legislation by which we are to make millionaires out of a few men or a few classes at the expense of the great mass of the American people, and we are urged to this policy because it is said that by encouraging manufactures we are making home markets for our products.

That, Mr. President, is answered by the argument that with all our manufacturing establishments, with all our high rates of duty, with all our exclusion of foreign commerce from the country in order to give the business of manufacturing to our own people, after supplying our own people with all they need of agricultural products, still we have some $500,000,000 worth annually that must be exported or must rot without use. So it is idle to talk in this country about making a home market to enable the agricultural classes to be prosperous by the sale of their commodities.

A very large proportion of our people are engaged in agriculture. It seems that this policy of class legislation is based upon the idea that those engaged in agriculture, being a majority of the people of the country, holding large interests so far as capital and ownership of the soil are concerned, producing large amounts of commodities, furnish the field from which to draw wealth for the benefit of the class interests of this country; and instead of pursuing a policy which shall look to equal justice to all the people, to protection of all people and all interests alike, and to give no exclusive privileges to any man or men or to any particular interest, we have taken exactly the opposite direction, and instead of by such means promoting the welfare and happiness of the people we adopt a plan of robbing the great mass of the people for the benefit of the few, making millionaires of the few and paupers of the many.

The extent to which the agricultural interests of this country, the farmers of this country, are loaded down with debt which they can not meet because of the policy which is pursued, it seems to me should awaken the attention of the men charged with the duty of legislation in this country. The scheme before us to give subsidies to ships rests upon the same idea; not upon the idea of equal justice and equal protection to all interests, but of giving a class money out of the Treasury at the expense of other people, and putting our shipping, like our manufactures, upon stilts, and leaving the agricultural interests of the country to support both.

Instead of stilted up other interests, I would let down those that are already on stilts, at least so far as the necessities of the country would permit letting them down. I would adopt a revenue tariff; I would try to limit the expenditures of the Government to what may be actually necessary. Having done that, with the vast resources of this country in production in the farms, the mines, and in the manufacturing establishments, we should at once have a commerce that would be sought by the shipping of the world. We should have large exports, we should have large imports. The truth is, it seems to me, that by a wise policy we ought almost to make the United States the warehouse of the world.

Mr. President, I have not so far examined this bill as to be able or willing to undertake the discussion of its details, and only desire in this general way to call attention to the public policy which underlies the measure, the giving subsidies to steam-ships or subsidies to anything else, and to say that we should liberalize our policy instead of making it more restrictive than it is at present, that we should reduce the power of classes to plunder the country instead of increasing the classes and increasing their power.

I do not feel that under the circumstances I should longer detain the Senate, having given this general expression of my view upon the policy involved in such measures as this.

Mr. MORGAN. I think, Mr. President, that in all the discussions which have occurred in regard to the subject presented in these two bills, Nos. 3738 and 3739, which are being discussed together, though not considered together, no examination perhaps has been more satisfactory or complete of all questions connected with it, historically and otherwise, than that which is found in the House report to accompany House bill No. 4683, I believe it is, including the opinions of the majority and also of the minority of that committee, and including also various statements made in the nature of testimony before that committee by several thoroughly trained and competent navigators and ship-owners and ship-builders; and we are left really, in the survey of this subject, merely to the duty of drawing just and proper conclusions from the evidence and the facts which that committee have so ably presented.

There is perhaps no one who is more earnestly sincere in the desire to see American commerce increase and to see an increase also of the tonnage of American ships than myself. We have been now for ninety-nine years trying a certain fixed policy in respect of this matter under which we have found that our commerce, in respect of the carriage of productions to and from the United States, has dwindled down until it is about 15 per cent., it may be not more than 12 per cent., of the entire shipments from our ports and importations into them.

For ninety-nine years, during which this result has come about that is regarded universally, I believe, as a disaster to American political economy, we have been trying one branch of a policy that we adopted in 1789; and I want to address a plea to my friend from Maine, whether he will not let us for one year out of the one hundred try the experiment of what we call free ships, the experiment of permitting our people to go abroad and buy ships and bring them here and put them under American registry, provided those who buy them and register them are American citizens.

It has been admitted in the debate here, and it has been admitted all through the debates that have occurred on this topic for years and years past, that there is a difference of from 20 to 30 per cent. in the cost of vessels of the same character built in the United States and those built in Great Britain, on the Clyde and elsewhere. I desire to present the plea in behalf of our people that they should be permitted to buy those ships at 20 and 30 per cent. discount on the prices at which they are compelled to buy them, if we put an American flag over them, from the United States ship-builders.

It is undeniably true that the merchants of the United States, the importers and the exporters both, own very large amounts of stock in foreign steam-ship lines, and in foreign steam-ships, and in tramps that go about where they please over the world and carry the cargoes just as safely as any other ships. When we say that our interest in the tonnage which exports our commerce or imports it, is reduced to 12 or 15 per cent. of the entire value of our exports and imports, we are not accurate if we undertake to apply those observations to the actual situation as to American capital employed in transportation on the high seas. It is impossible to ascertain how much of American capital is employed in ships that sail under the flag of Great Britain, or Germany, or France, or Norway, or any other of the great maritime powers, but we know that a very large part of the capital invested in those ships and over which the British and other flags float is capital furnished by American merchants and American manufacturers, American exporters and American importers.

The reason, and only reason, why that capital is not represented in the tonnage of ships under the American flag is that the old law has been held on to without any relaxation at all, which prohibits the raising of the American flag on the deck of a ship that is not exclusively built in the United States and owned by citizens of the United States.

That kind of policy has compelled our merchants, who have found it convenient and profitable for their business to be engaged in the ownership of vessels, to put them out under the flags of different countries. They enjoy the profit; they have their goods carried back and forth; they are supplied with all the conveniences and facilities of transportation that are necessary to their business, no matter how great it may be; but they can not put their capital and their tonnage under the American flag because of the prohibition of that old statute.

We began our career as a nation under circumstances of a very peculiar character. The mother country was at that time the predominant power in the world upon the seas as to her commercial marine and also as to her naval power. She used that in every way that she could, after she had recognized our Independence, to cripple our commerce, and when she found that, by reason of the great abundance of ship-timber material in the United States and the cheapness of it and the enterprise and skill of our ship-builders, we were covering the seas with our own flag upon the masts of ships that were built of American timber and in American ports, Great Britain resolved that she would resort to any policy that she could for the purpose of breaking down that business of ship construction and also for the purpose of preventing an extension, or an expansion rather, of our commerce.

The United States had to resort then, in the very infancy of its life, to retaliatory laws for the purpose of preventing herself from being crushed out, first by Great Britain and afterwards by France, who was our ally during the Revolutionary war. We had a right to expect better things from France, but we found that, because we would not join in certain alliances with her to carry out her ambitious policies in Europe and elsewhere in the world, she, too, determined that she would cripple our growing commerce and repeat all kinds of impressments upon us. She seized our ships and carried them into her ports and condemned them for no cause; and out of that resulted the French spoliation claims, which we have not got done with yet. We are still dealing with the question as to how much we shall pay and to whom we shall pay the damages that resulted from a settlement of those controversies between our Government and France arising out of these interruptions of our commerce and navigation.

The United States, therefore, in the beginning rightfully and properly resorted to discriminative duties, to retaliatory duties, to differential duties, whatever name you choose to call them by, under which we charged as customs dues very largely more for goods imported in foreign-built ships and foreign-owned ships than we did for goods imported in American-built ships and American-owned ships.

Great Britain had already adopted this differential system in respect of our commerce; and her grasp upon the commerce of the world, and particularly upon our own infantile struggles to expand our commerce, was relaxed very slowly. The first relaxation was to admit us to trade freely back and forth to her East India possessions, excluding us at that time from the West Indies and also from the Canadian ports. After awhile a more and more liberal policy was adopted on the part of Great Britain, and we commenced liberalizing our policy. It was then the fashion of the world among all the great powers that commerce should be conducted upon principles of commercial hostility, as if such an idea as that could connect itself with the real prosperity, enlightenment, civilization, and uplifting of mankind.

Commercial hostility, Mr. President, is a thing that shocks the common sense and the sense of justice of mankind. For any one nation, whether it is possessed of peculiar productions or not, to lock itself up within its own borders and surround itself by laws which are hostile to commerce with other countries, is to place itself in an attitude which is entirely unjustifiable, I think, in the moral law, and certainly it is unjustifiable in the laws which relate to political economy.

The nations of the earth began, however, to relax these hostile attitudes toward each other, to take off restrictions from their commerce, and those who made the first and the greatest relaxations were certainly the most prosperous and have always proven to be so. Following their example we have now banished from our laws all that might be styled as commercial hostility to any nation in the world except that portion of it (which is really more hostile to our own people than it is to other countries) which compels us still to sail the American flag only over American bottoms owned by American people. Differential and discriminating duties against the commerce of Great Britain, France, Germany, Austria, or any other of the great powers of the earth have been entirely abolished; they have disappeared, not only on our side of the ocean, but on the other side.

China itself has come into terms of liberal reciprocity in matters of this kind with the other nations of the earth, and so has Japan. So now there is no nation on this earth but one, and that is the United States, which has upon its statute-book any statute that is in the slightest degree hostile to the liberty of commerce, whether concerning her own citizens or concerning the citizens of other parts of the earth.

The report to which I have referred presents in succession a synopsis of each one of the statutes that I have alluded to and shows the gradual and final disappearance from our statute-book of all discriminating and differential duties in respect of other countries, unless it may be in instances where we have given the power to the President of the United States that if any other nation should set up against us discriminative or differential duties then the President may put in operation such duties against them and prohibit the introduction of their commerce into our ports except upon certain very stringent conditions.

Now, with the qualifications which I have just mentioned, that our own merchants, exporters, and importers do own a very large share in the vessels which bring products to our coast and carry our productions away, it is very true that the carrying trade of the United States to and from foreign ports has descended until it has got to a very remarkably low and discreditable figure; and on all sides, with equal patriotism and an equal desire to promote the best interests of all the navigators and ship-owners who belong to our country, our purpose is to try to stimulate the ownership of vessels, the navigation of vessels, the freighting of vessels, and to make all necessary liberal arrangements so that our seafaring men may earn good wages upon their investments and have steady and profitable employment.

While this has been going on and we have been losing tonnage from the maritime record of the world, which gives us so much trouble and which we would so gladly relieve against, yet our commerce has expanded in a most wonderful degree. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] in his remarks upon this bill alluded to the fact, as he claimed, that the people of the United States were paying enormous sums in the way of freights to foreign countries which ought to be earned by our own people and go into their own pockets. There is one thing to be said about that. If foreign countries have earned a very large amount of money upon freights transported to and from our coasts, it has been because they could do that work cheaper than our own ships could do it. It has been because, and only because, the rates of freight which they could offer to our people were lower than the rates of freight that can be offered to them or have been offered to them by American-built and American-owned ships.

I can not see that the people at large, the agriculturists, the producers of every kind, in the mines, and in the fisheries, and in the forests, have lost this money because they have paid it to British owners of ships, or German or French owners, or Norwegian or Italian owners. We have not lost that money. On the contrary, we have paid it to them because in doing so we could get the freights upon what we had to send abroad and what we had to import into the country at a cheaper rate than the American sailors could afford to take our goods for. So, instead of that being a loss to the great body of the people of the United States, it is a gain to them; but it has been a loss to one class, and only to one class, and that is to the ship-owners.

Looking at the matter in that light and disconnecting it from any pride of our nationality, we are not so prone to regret the fact that the people of the United States have been able to expand their commerce so vastly and so rapidly in consequence of the low rate of freights that they have got upon their exports and upon their imports. It certainly is to the great advantage of commerce that freights should be low; but it is to the disadvantage of the navigator or the ship-owner that freights should be low. I am perfectly willing to resort to any system that is proper for the purpose of equalizing the gains and the losses of all the different classes concerned in the commerce of the United States, for it is equality that I desire more than anything else. I do not desire for the cotton-shippers of the South, for instance, an advantage over the navigators. I am willing that the latter should have fair rates for all that they carry abroad for us and all they bring into this country for us; but I am not willing to take the money taxed out of the cotton-growers and put it into the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of making the difference in freights between what the Germans and the French and the English charge us and what the American ship-owner desires to charge us.

The only reason why the investment of American money in ships is not profitable, and thereby the tonnage of our country is decreasing, is the fact, and only the fact that, when they pay from 20 to 30 per cent. more for their ships than they can be bought for by capital abroad, they can not afford to put their rate of freights as low as foreign-built ships do. That is the whole subject. Then the question recurs whether we shall make up this difference to them by a subsidy or by an appropriation out of the Treasury of the United States.

What would be thought of the people of the South if they were to come here and tell us that they could not manufacture cotton as cheap as it is done in India and in Egypt, and that it is a very great consideration for the United States and for the world that our cotton crop should be produced and spun and exported, and thereupon they should ask us to vote them out of the Treasury of the United States the difference in the cost of the production of cotton here in this country and in Egypt or India. The absurdity of the claim would at once justify its rejection, and it would be rejected with indignation. But it is precisely the same question that is presented in this bill for the benefit of the ship-owner. He says, "At the rates of freight which these other nations are able to charge who buy their ships 20 or 30 per cent. lower than we do, some of whom are subsidized, we can not afford to give to the cotton-planter or the cotton-shipper rates as low as the men who are thus subsidized."

"We must have a higher rate of freight. We can not get it out of the people. We can not compel a man to ship his cotton under the American flag when he can get a lower rate of freight upon a vessel that is owned in England, Germany, France, or elsewhere. Not having the power to compel him to ship his cotton on board of an American ship at an advanced rate of freight, we just ask you that you will make up the difference. We want you now to take out of the Treasury of the United States money enough to compensate us for the difference in these freights. We will call it a subsidy or we will call it a bounty upon the ship and upon its sailing, etc., but that is what we wish you to do, to take the money out of the Treasury and make up to us the difference in the freights."

I look over this bill and I desire to ascertain whether there is any provision in it that looks to the lowering of freights, for instance, upon the cotton crop. There is nothing of that kind. There is no expectation or pretense in this bill that the freights upon the cotton crop of the United States are to be lowered by it. It is claimed that the freights are low enough now, and perhaps too low; and when you have subsidized the ships of the United States and they go into the market for the purpose of getting cargoes to ship abroad out of the cotton crop they will say to each other and they will say to the cotton-planter, "We can not afford to put the freights at a lower rate than they are." On the British, French, and German ships the cotton-planter must pay just what he does now, and no lower rate of freight, and the difference in favor of the American ship-owner must be made up by an appropriation out of the Treasury of the United States, and that difference must be taxed out of the people.

So after all, Mr. President, like all other taxes these come to fall upon the men who are producers in this country. We say, ordinarily, that they fall upon the consumers, but after all when we come to bring the thing to its last analysis it is the producer in the country who pays taxes, especially of this character. We can not get along without the productions of agriculture, including the textiles, and the grains, and the meats, and the products of every kind that are produced by the farmer, the fruits and so on; neither can we get along without the productions of the mines from which coal and coke are brought and iron is manufactured, and copper, zinc, steel, and a great many other things are produced and manufactured.

We can not get along without the manufacture of woods, where the forests are converted, or the fisheries. We can not dispense with them; but after we have gotten outside of the line of these elementary productions there is no man in this country who makes anything upon which taxes are produced. It is true that his skill is incorporated with the various different elementary productions, and they are made more and more valuable as more and more of skill and patient labor are bestowed upon them; but after all when you come to bring taxation down upon the real basis upon which it rests it is the producer who has to pay it, for the cost that he gets out of the production, the reward for his labor that he extracts from the production that he makes, whether it is in one commodity or in another, is always reduced by the amount of taxation that the article has to bear.

So in the case I have just been supposing, where after the passage of this bill the ship-owners should say to the planters, "We can not afford to carry your cotton across the ocean at any lower rate than you are paying now, but we will look to the Government of the United States for the profit that we otherwise would make in carrying your freight at a higher rate, and the Government of the United States will look to you for the taxation to supply the money to pay the profit." After all, it is a tax upon a man's commerce that he brings forth from the bowels of the earth or from its surface, given to another man, taken from him and given to another man to induce that other man to carry his produce across the seas under a certain flag.

Now, the question has been put here very earnestly and debated very forcibly indeed, whether the decadence of our tonnage in the transportation to and from the American productions is due to the rivalry which other nations have been able to keep up in consequence of subsidies, or whether it is due to some other cause, and, if so, to what cause? I think that there is a very easy and a very natural way of accounting for the fact that no more money has gone into the building up of our commercial marine than has in the last twenty or twenty-five years, particularly in that period since the occurrence of the civil war.

When we look over what has been done in the United States in that period of time, or running back to 1840, let us say; when we look at what has been accomplished through the industry of these people and through the use of money that they have borrowed from other countries as well as money that they have earned from their crops and other enterprises and industries, we find that our situation has been one of remarkable progress and one differing from every other country in the world at the present and differing in its history through these years from the history of any other country that ever existed.

First of all, the configuration of our continent here, the part of it that we occupy, places us between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans without any break in our territory. We are solid from side to side, we are solid from the Lakes down to the Gulf and to the border of Mexico. Embraced within that area is a larger amount of fertile agricultural land than can be found in any similar area in the world. You may take Russia, Germany, Austria, Italy, Hungary, Bulgaria, and all of the states of the Balkan Peninsula, including Turkey—you may take all of that area of country and compare it acre by acre, mile by mile, with that which is included within this great solid possession of ours between these oceans and the Lakes and the Gulf, and there is no part of that country which compares really on an average at least with the territory that we have been occupying and improving.

A hundred years ago we had about 4,000,000 people, not exceeding 5,000,000. I think 4,000,000 is perhaps a fair calculation of the population we had a hundred years ago. We have now 65,000,000. That is sixteen times and more increase over the population we had then. During this century we have had those people to raise, to clothe, to feed, to house, to educate, and to provide for their comfort in a degree of luxurious enjoyment which I think no other race of men in a hundred years have had as compared with ours. It has cost an enormous amount of money, and labor, and industry, and attention to do that one thing.

Take the food, the clothing, the housing, the furniture, the public institutions, the high-ways, the churches, and all the appliances of a great civil society like ours. Take the cities and the towns that we have had to build in a hundred years for the accommodation of the people of the United States, and then take the enormous amount of active capital and credit that it has required in order to bring about the results that we see spread around us with such wonderful beauty.

Besides that, we have been engaged in other very great enterprises. In the last half of that century we have built more than 160,000 miles of railroad; and the cost of that up to the latest statement that I have been able to find was $9,873,970,372. In 1888 interest was paid on the bonds the fruits of which entered into the construction of the roads to the amount of $199,062,531. The railroads have paid other interest, $6,217,521, making in all $205,280,052 that they have paid in interest; and then in dividends they have paid $78,943,041, making in all $284,223,093, the annual earnings of this vast system of railway that they have laid down in the United States.

Now we know that fully one-half, perhaps I would not be extravagant in saying that two-thirds of the money with which these railroads have been built and equipped, this nine billion and odd million dollars, has been borrowed from foreign countries. We have gone and mortgaged our railroads. There is not one in the United States, I suppose, that is 50 miles long that is not under bond and mortgage, and the bonds and mortgages are, at least, I think, two-thirds of them, held in foreign countries. So of the stocks, for the stocks in these railroads usually have attended the destiny of the bonds and mortgages and have gone along with them.

In addition to the investment which we have made of more than $9,000,000,000 for the building of these roads we have been paying annually for some years past more than $200,000,000 of interest and dividends. Think of what a tax that is upon the industry and enterprise, the power and credit of a people. Then take in addition to that the national banks and other banks of the United States and we find that by the latest account there is invested in the national banks in the way of paid-up capital $617,723,447, and the banks had in their vaults in currency and in good paper and in capital stock paid up $5,201,671,790 on the 1st of June, 1889.

There are about $14,000,000,000 that have been expended in the United States since about the year of 1864 in the building of these railways and in the accumulation put into these banks in the form of credits, earnings, or paper discounted, either due or to fall due. Besides that, how much money have we invested in manufactures? How much have we invested in manufactures in the last fifty years? I applied to the Bureau of Statistics to ascertain, if I could, some approximate statement upon that subject, but I could not get it. They say that since the last decennial census no accurate account has been obtainable in regard to the amount of money that we have invested in manufactures, but it certainly is equivalent to the amount invested in the national banks and probably it is very much larger than that.

How much have we got invested in the fisheries? Very large amounts of money. How much in mines of various descriptions for the precious metals and for the baser metals? How much in ships and boats and canals, structures of different kinds for the conduct of internal commerce? Within what space of time has it been that all of these earnings, these accumulations, these results of industrial credit have been thus invested and have materialized in the property of the country?

Sir, there has never been so prosperous, never so busy, never so industrious, never so thrifty, so energetic, and so successful a people as the people of the United States have been during the last forty or fifty years. And yet we take out the losses of a four years', nearly a five years' conflict of arms which resulted in the wastage of millions untold almost of wealth that had been accumulated in the United States.

Now, there is not one of these industries, there is not one of these great enterprises, including manufactures, mining, banking, railroad building, railroad operating, agriculture, that has not been earning good wages for those employed. There has been no material distress among the people in consequence even of overproduction, although the laws of the United States have tended very seriously to cramp production down to the point of home consumption simply.

Mr. President, after we have been building up these great railways, organizing and capitalizing these banks, putting the busy wheels of industry at work in the different parts of the United States, and boring into the depths of the earth for the precious and other metals and for coal, is it any wonder that we have neglected to invest our money in ships when the competition of the world was against us there and we had no power to shut it out except in respect of our coasting trade? The differential laws which warred upon commerce were all broken down and they are broken down to such a degree that they can not be restored. I dare say there is not a Senator in this body who would offer a bill here for the purpose of restoring the ancient statutes of the United States making differences in the duty to be paid upon goods imported in American bottoms or in English or German bottoms. The spirit of the age has carried us entirely away from that dark period, and we could not maintain the respectability of the nation even on a par with that of China if we should now undertake to restore those laws to the statute-books.

Mr. GIBSON. I will ask the Senator from Alabama if we are not prohibited by treaties from doing it.

Mr. MORGAN. I know we are prohibited by treaties of course from doing it, but treaty prohibition is not everlasting. When I speak about the enactment of laws to get back to this old régime I include the fact, of course, that we should have to abrogate our treaties with all the great powers of the earth. Yes, the diplomatic powers of this world have come to a common conclusion that the differential duties are not to be tolerated in commerce, that they are against the spirit of the age, and that trade must be free at least from the embarrassment of differential duties.

We have passed that period, and we can not get back to it through the barrier of our treaties, nor can we afford to surmount our character and our respectability so far as to undertake to go back to that antiquated and obsolete condition of legislation. So we must stay where we are. We can not escape the light of the nineteenth century as it pours in upon us, or our responsibilities that belong to what I conceive to be the greatest and most prosperous people in this world. We must stay where we are; we can not get back to that by any legislative expedient.

If we could get back to it and make a difference in our customs dues of, say, 10 per cent. in favor of those goods which are imported in American bottoms we could get rich very rapidly upon that, and we should have such a commercial marine as nobody ever saw; but other nations would immediately pass a retaliatory law of the same kind; they would forbid the importation of our commercial products into their country except under like conditions, and there would be inaugurated the war of commerce with which we commenced our existence in the United States and which we outgrew when we got up to the condition of robust manhood. I do not want to get back into that war of commerce. I want to abrogate ever feature of it, I want to remove every trace and mark of it from the statute-books; and one of the very first and most unbecoming features of it is this provision that an American shall not sail a ship under the American flag unless that ship is built in an American port, owned by Americans, and registered and licensed here.

When Great Britain found it to her interest as well as in correspondence with the progressive spirit of her people to make relaxations of the difficulties and obstructions and embarrassments which she had placed upon the commerce of the world, and particularly upon the commerce of the United States, she went as far as she could go in repealing all of her obnoxious statutes, her orders in council of every kind which stood in the way of the very freest commerce. She repealed her navigation laws. She permitted her citizens to go into any country in the world and to buy ships as they could buy anything else for the purpose of conducting commerce.

She had a very peculiar motive in the relaxation of her system of economics on that point. It was that the American clipper ships, what were called the Baltimore clippers, and indeed other sailing ships of the United States, had accomplished a great success in the speed and safety of the transit across the seas and also in carrying very large cargoes. Great Britain saw that possessing as we did all the elements of ship-building here in superiority over any other country in the world, or at least any country that was then known, she must enable her people to buy these clipper ships in order to have them compete with us in their commercial enterprises and in holding and retaining their hold upon the trade of the world across the sea. So she repealed her navigation laws.

She permitted her citizens to go out and buy ships in any country. The first and most beneficial inducement to this course of procedure was to enable the commercial men of Great Britain to get hold of these fast-sailing American clippers. She broke the law down and permitted her people to come here and buy ships.

Now, Mr. President, there is something about traffic on the seas, there is something about this business of freighting goods across the oceans which is a little different from almost any other kind of traffic that you can speak of. The United States at one time, just before the war, had a very large carrying trade. The occasion of the war, together with some other circumstances of a very influential character, broke that trade up. Her merchants lost their corresponding relations to the different business houses of the world. The commerce was interrupted, and interrupted for such a length of time that new relationships were formed, new business transactions were entered upon.

You can do that with almost any other business except commerce across the high seas. You can interrupt business between a merchant in New York and a merchant in New Orleans, whose business is transacted across railways, without any serious inconvenience to any person, because at either end of the line they can choose different correspondents and carry on the trade as usual. But when you break a line of communication across the sea, and the ships that were engaged in conducting it disappear and new lines of packets, steamers, or what not have to be employed to carry on this traffic, the connection when once broken in this way is hard to replace. You have got to get the vessels with which to replace it. You have got to make the new commercial arrangements corresponding with your facilities for the transportation of goods back and forth.

When the American people lost these lines of transportation and had these commercial connections all broken up by the event of the war it naturally would take us a long time to get back into place again. In the mean while Great Britain, availing herself of iron as the material for the structure of ships, cheaper to her than even timber was to us in the manufacture of vessels, at once put the energies of her people to work in the building of iron ships, and they took the place of the American wooden ship, and took the channels of trade, and took from the navigators, the ship-owners of the United States, the transportation from which they had reaped such a large harvest in times that were past.

It seems to me that the facts to which I have been adverting account sufficiently for the decadence of the tonnage, or rather of the ownership, of vessels entitled to register under the American flag. Our people are not by any means wanting in the facilities of commerce controlled by their own money, for they own ships, as I have said, in a very large part, which sail under foreign flags; but what they want, and what they would like to have, what would contribute to the just pride of the people of the United States, and doubtless would build up to a greater extent than it has done heretofore the commerce of the country, is the opportunity and the privilege of conducting the transportation of goods across the oceans under the American flag.

I think that is particularly important in the use of vessels for the transportation of the mails. I do not think, if we can avoid it, that the mails of the United States should be carried under any other than the American flag. I think the flag is a very potent instrumentality and symbol also of national sovereignty when you come to associating it with work for the Government. I regard it as a matter of importance that every vessel that carries the mails of the United States to and fro across the oceans should be under the American flag if we can get it so.

We want to put our naval officers aboard of these ships; we want, according to the provisions of the Senate bill which is presented here, to have them prepared for service in time of war as a sort of naval reserve that can be resorted to, not merely for the transportation of munitions of war and armies, but also carrying guns with which to defend themselves and also to defend the commerce of the United States and to inflict injuries, if it must be, upon the commerce of other countries.

I think that an American ship carrying the American flag and the American mails combines three important characteristics of Government service. I am not in favor of limiting the structure of that ship to American ports of American ship-builders, but I want it American owned and American officered, and I want the seamen on it to be seamen of the United States also—American citizens.

But when we come to the other proposition, as to the mere conveyance of commerce as a private transaction between man and man or between port and port, I can see no particular reason why it is not just as patriotic in me to take a ship at a lower rate of freight, if it is German or French or English, in preference to one at a higher rate of freight that is American, at my option. It is neither unpatriotic nor unwise, and, if it were both, 999 per cent. out of every thousand men in the world engaged in commerce would always take the lower freight and let the flag go, for they can not see that there is any particular advantage in having this special piece of bunting or that piece of bunting erected upon a ship which is carrying coal, flour, or cotton, in place of some other piece. It is a purely private business transaction, and you might just as well say to the railroad companies in the United States that they shall not go to England and buy their locomotives, pay the duty upon them, and bring them here, and they shall not be run upon American railways unless they are American built, as to say to any other person, "You shall not run a ship under the American flag unless it is actually built in the United States, officered and manned in the United States." There is no more reason for saying the one thing than the other.

Mr. President, the people of the United States have endeavored by the use of bounty money to relieve the differences which have been caused by this old statute in the navigation laws, and they have spent more than $33,000,000 according to the report which I have got here, $33,974,879.96 from 1848 up to 1889, in their endeavor to foster American ships by bounties.

Opinion on this question has undergone a variety of changes, it appears, and men ought to have fixed opinions upon it and ought to have had them long ago, but they vary and vacillate to that degree that I am not disposed to attach very much importance to the opinions of most of them, to say the least of it.

In 1869 there was a great commotion and controversy in the United States as to what was the best thing that could be done then for the advancement of the interests of the American ship-builder, and it was concluded then to enact that section of the Revised Statutes which is still found upon the statute-book, and which is repeated, I believe, in the report of the tariff bill to the Senate at this present session, and it was renewed in hæc verba in 1883 in the tariff of that year. That statute provided for a drawback for the whole amount of duty upon all kinds of material, of all sorts, shapes, and sizes, that enter into the construction of an American-built ship built for the foreign service, and that ship might run for a period of two months in any year in the coasting trade, and might continue, if in American ownership and under American officers, to run exclusively in the coasting trade, provided it would repay to the United States the amount of the rebates that had been allowed upon the material that entered into its construction.

Mr. FRYE. I think that did not include angles and plates.

Mr. MORGAN. It may not have included some new contrivances that have come in since, but by a liberal and I have no doubt a proper construction of that act those things are now included in the right of drawback.

That in 1869 was the proposed policy for the relief of the American ship-builder. He was expected to build ships for foreign service and for foreign countries. It is true they could not come in under the registration laws of the United States, except upon the coasting trade, under the conditions I have named; but in order to enable him to compete with foreign ship-builders he was permitted to have a drawback to the full amount of duties on all the material that he might import from abroad and put into a ship. That was an enormous advantage over any other description of producer in the country. There were some manufacturers, I grant you, who had similar privileges, but the producers of the country could not reach anything of that kind. They had no such advantages and we could not give them to them by any ingenuity of law that we could enact. When that subject was up in 1869 Mr. Roach was before the House committee to investigate the cause of the decline of our shipping interests. He said:

America has lost her commerce, and what has she obtained in exchange for it? Simply the right of a few men to charge $9 per ton in gold on the importation of pig-iron. Pig-iron is the basis of all other metals connected with the making and repairing of ships. There has been a revolution in ship-building, and iron is the material from which they are now built. The high cost of iron produced by the tariff upon it is one of the principal difficulties our commerce has to contend with. I did not come here to ask a bounty. I came here to tell you that, while all other articles of American produce are protected to a great extent, there is no protection for American ships. If Congress will take off all the duties from American iron, reducing it to the price of foreign iron, then we are prepared to compete with foreign ship-builders. The labor question is misstated; we are prepared to meet that difficulty and to ask no further legislation on the subject.

That was John Roach in 1869. And under the pressure of such advice coming from him and other very high authorities on ship-building we went on and provided the statute of 1869, in which we gave them back all duties of every kind upon all the material, even to the cordage and the twine and the white metal and everything else that entered into the construction of a steam-ship or any other ship. That was supposed to be enough.

In the Forty-ninth Congress the Select Committee on American Ship-Building and Ship-Owners made the following report upon "A bill to amend section 4132 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, so as to authorize the purchase of foreign-built ships by citizens of the United States, and to permit the same to be registered as vessels of the United States," which report was adopted by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries in the Fiftieth Congress. So it was adopted by the committees in two Congresses.

We herewith adopt the same and make it a part of this report.

I will read a few extracts from that report on the point I have been trying to discuss:

Under existing laws imposing import duties, taxes ranging from 18 to 69 per cent. ad valorem are imposed upon the chief articles of imported materials used in the construction of vessels for the foreign and coastwise trade, subject to the modifications contained in section 2513 of the Revised Statutes of the United States providing for certain rebates upon imported materials used in the construction of vessels for foreign trade.

The bill reported and recommended by the majority of the committee provides, in substance, that all vessels, of whatever build, owned wholly by citizens of the United States, or by companies incorporated under the laws thereof, or of any State or Territory of the United States, may be registered as vessels of the United States, and shall be entitled to all the benefits and privileges appertaining to such vessels. The existing law, denying registration as vessels of the United States to all vessels except such as were built within the United States, was enacted December 31, 1792, and its object was to give protection to the ship-building interest of the United States, then in its infancy.

However wise and beneficent such a policy may have been under the conditions then existing in this country and amongst the nations then competing for the carrying trade upon the high seas, it is now thought by many of the wisest and most thoughtful statesmen and economists of the country that the policy of that particular method of protecting that branch of our shipping interests has exhausted itself, and, instead of producing further benefits for the public good and general welfare, that it is now, and has been for many years past, reacting most disastrously to the general public good and especially to our shipping engaged in the foreign carrying trade, and indeed to the ship-building interest itself, for unless there be employment for ships there can be no demand for them.

That statement in that report summarized really the whole argument in the case. Further along in that report the following remark is made:

It has been truly said that the difference of 1 penny per bushel in the cost of transporting wheat or corn from the United States to Liverpool might deprive us of a market for our entire annual surplus of breadstuffs. In view of the strong and increasing competition that our grain products are now encountering from those of Southern Russia, Roumania, and India, this statement assumes vast importance, if it be not even startling. To reduce the cost, then, of transporting across the ocean not only what we buy, but more especially what we sell, to the minimum should be the leading thought of our national policy and statesmanship.

How shall this result be attained if our people be debarred from entering into that wholesome competition with foreigners for the carrying trade by which alone that minimum in the cost of transporting our products can be expected to be reached? While wooden sailing ships did the ocean carrying trade of the world, and those ships could be built cheaper in the United States than elsewhere, we took and steadily maintained a leading position in the world's ocean carrying trade, and carried 75 per cent. of our own foreign commerce.

The increase in our shipping from 1830 to 1840 was 60 per cent.; from 1840 to 1850, 75 per cent.; and from 1850 to 1860, 60 per cent. Had the then existing conditions continued we should soon have been mistress of the seas. England had become thoroughly alarmed, and to counteract the danger repealed all her restrictive shipping laws in 1849, and enacted instead her present liberal and enlightened shipping laws, permitting all vessels, wherever built, belonging wholly to English subjects, to be registered as English vessels, and removing all taxes and burdens. She also opened the doors of competition wide by making even her coasting trade free to the vessels of all nations.

I will continue to read a little more from this report, as it presents the whole subject in a nutshell, and I think with great terseness and precision:

This wise and wholesome policy was gradually bearing its rich and valuable fruits when another most important factor came to her relief, and in connection with these liberal laws completely restored her dominion upon the seas. It was discovered that ships could be built of iron and steel and propelled by steam, and that these could be built in England cheaper than in the United States.

About the year 1856 England commenced to build iron and steel steam-ships, and as fast as they were built and equipped the commerce of the world was transferred to them because of their superior speed and supposed safety. To compete with such vessels with wooden sailing ships was, of course, as futile as it would be now to send an army of savages armed with bows and arrows against a modern army with guns and artillery of the most improved type.

There was but one hope left us for further effort at maintaining our position and interests in the carrying trade, and that was to do what all other countries wisely did: repeal our antiquated restrictive navigation laws and allow our people to buy iron and steel steamers where they could get them as cheaply as their foreign competitors and register them as vessels of the United States.

That was the conclusion of that committee.

In 1872 the Pacific Mail Steam-Ship Company came forward and asked for a subsidy. The House of Representatives passed a bill to grant the subsidy to the amount of $500,000 upon the general appropriation bill for the Post-Office Department.

An amendment was moved to the Pacific Mail contract, making it $1,000,000 instead of $500,000. Mr. Kerr characterized the arguments for subsidies as the "old and pretentious prayer of the few, the aggregated wealth of the rich corporations, for extorting contributions from the people. These contributions are for their own individual pecuniary benefit. The country will gain nothing by them. Commerce will become no cheaper." Mr. Benjamin Butler said:

"I am opposed diametrically with all my might, with all my judgment, with all my strength, to the idea of subsidizing any lines whatever. The only time when this Government attempted to subsidize a line of steamers, the great 'Collins Line,' we not only lost our money, but we ruined those whom we undertook to aid."

The amendment was lost in the House on the 20th of March, 1872, but on the 2d of May the bill was reported to the Senate by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations with the above amendment attached. The amendment passed. Senators SHERMAN, of Ohio, Chandler, of Michigan, and MORRILL, of Vermont, opposed it.

Then the motion was made to increase the Brazil subsidy to $450,000 for a semi-monthly mail for ten years.

Mr. Chandler said:

"It is desirable to own iron ships, very desirable, and I hope to see the day when we shall have our old supremacy in shipping; but it never will be done in the world by subsidies. It is not the subsidized lines of Great Britain that pay the largest returns. * * * You will never restore your flag to the ocean by subsidies. I care not how great you may make them; you may increase your subsidies to $10,000,000 a year and you will not restore your flag."

Mr. MORRILL said:

"Is it practicable to recall our shipping? I think it is, and by the simplest process. Not a dollar of subsidies. Give us cheap materials and we will do it. Give us the ground on which we stand, so that we shall have our materials just as cheap as they can be afforded elsewhere, and then all these ship-yards and all that skilled labor will be at work at once; and you will find that we shall restore the balance of the shipping interests on the ocean that now stands against us."

Senator SHERMAN, in a speech advocating free ships, said:

"Since we can not build these vessels within 20 or 30 per cent. of the cost in England, why not admit them free? Why not admit them duty free, raise the American flag upon them, put American officers upon their decks, and have American lines instead of British lines? Why, sir, if that bill should pass, authorizing foreign ships when owned by American citizens to be used for the present, for three years under the American flag, one-half of the lines between New York and England would be American lines in sixty days."

Senator EDMUNDS declared that it was as much unconstitutional and wrong to grant these subsidies to Americans as to give them to foreigners, and that he could not support them.

Hon. J. G. CAYTON, during the debate on the subsidy question, February 23, 1879, used the following words:

"Now, what is this proposition? Oh, it is to give John Roach $3,000,000 as a practical gratuity and to charge that as a tax on the cotton, and provisions, and tobacco, and wheat, and grain, and breadstuffs, and oil, that we produce. What for? To enable somebody to sell something that he has made, which it cost $1.43 to make here, while it costs only a dollar to make it in Europe, and both manufacturers have to go to the same market, namely, Brazil. Why, gentlemen, if you had a business agent who proposed to do your private business in that way, you would put him into a lunatic asylum, or swear that he was a thief or an idiot, and discharge him."

"Commencing in the year 1847 down to the present time (1879) act after act has been passed for a similar purpose [postal subsidies]. I hold in my hand the official statements of the Secretary of the Navy and the Postmaster-General, which show payments of subsidies to the amount, in round numbers, of $14,500,000 to steam-ship lines during the period from the year 1848 to 1858. I hold in my hand a statement that shows subsidies to the amount of $7,000,000, in round numbers, since that time, making over $21,000,000 that have been paid out of the Treasury for the purpose of establishing steam-ship lines—$7,000,000 would buy all the steam-ships engaged in commerce that sail under the American flag on every ocean in the world—and, more than that, the subsidizing of these steam-ship lines, from the 'Collins' line in 1852 up to the present time, has bankrupted every prominent man that has favored it."

Those are pretty high authorities, Mr. President, upon the question we are discussing, and I should think that the gentlemen connected with the making of laws for the United States Government, who had such fixed convictions as far back as the period I have been referring to, would by this time have made some serious effort to relieve our navigation laws from the only restriction which they indicate here has been in the way of the building of American ships and American ownership of American bottoms. By "American bottoms" I mean bottoms that are sailed under the American flag.

It seems to me that it is beyond all question that these gentlemen stated this proposition plainly, succinctly, as clearly and with as much force as it is possible to state it, and that the only remaining duty we have now, whether we connect this question of navigation with the postal service or merely with the commercial marine, is to enable our people to take their money and go abroad and buy ships unless they can buy them on equally advantageous terms from American ship-builders, who have the right to import their material all free, and on those ships to commence carrying the commerce of the United States.

The first operation in that direction will be amongst the exporting merchants and importing merchants. They will wish to make enough profits out of the ownership of the vessels to take up a large part, if not all the freights that they would have to pay upon goods that they export and goods that they import. The business of freighting goods upon ships is naturally connected with the export and import trade, and these would be the first men who would go into this business, and they would take into it very large amounts of capital.

Why, sir, in the Southern States, where we have not got the art of ship-building, where we have not the ship-yards, or the accumulation of money, or the opportunity of building ship-yards and building vessels, I have not a doubt that very large amounts of money would find their way very soon into steam-vessels which would carry cotton to Liverpool, carry cargoes to South America, or bring cargoes back to the United States, and also transport our coal, and iron, and timber, and a great many other things that we have in the South from which we could make very large contributions to the value of the general commerce of the country, and the people who desire to trade with us and live down in the southern part of this hemisphere.

Now I will take the second bill, or both of them, if you please, of the Senator from Maine, and inquire as to what classes of vessels and what vessels are in existence to-day that would probably receive the benefits of this bounty if we should have it, and how long it would be before the people of any other part of the country, except those parts that have ship-yards already erected, could possibly engage in the business of building ships to come up to the description which is found in these two bills.

You may take the bay of Mobile, which I think is a most admirable situation for the building of ships; take all the waters of Mobile River, from the city of Mobile up to Mount Vernon arsenal, which is a possession of the United States Government, and a very beautiful and very valuable one besides, you would commence the building of a dry-dock or ship-construction yards at some convenient and eligible location for the building of ships of commerce, say of 2,500 or 3,000 ton steamers.

You have there every description of wood that you could desire, almost without cost, that would enter into the construction of the inner works of a steam-ship, an iron or a steel steam-ship. You go up the Alabama River or go up the Tombigbee River or the Warrior River by water navigation until you come within 30 or 40 miles of the interior of those great coal and iron fields of that country. I see my friend from Vermont in front of me [Mr. MORRILL], who knows about the possessions of a certain company there, within 30 miles of the navigable waters of the Upper Alabama River, the Coosa River, where there is a vast amount of iron ore, beautiful timber and coal, all upon the same tract of land and that tract of land really valuable for agricultural purposes besides.

At Mobile you would have the advantage, in building these ships of commerce, of iron that can be made in the pig-metal at Birmingham at $9.50 a ton at a fair profit. What kind of iron is it? It is iron sufficiently strong to make a car axle or a car wheel, and I suppose when rolled out, drawn out properly, it would have sufficient strength and ductility also to make the skin of an iron ship. At Birmingham and in the vicinity you can make the engines, perhaps, cheaper than you can make them anywhere else in the United States.

You have got down there great transportation by railway, and you have got river transportation in competition with it almost the entire distance from the mines to Mobile. I do not see why ship-yards for the building of a commercial marine might not as well be put up at Mobile as at any other point in the United States, and it would be particularly valuable to have repair yards there and docks upon which vessels could be floated, and become a most important and most immense factor in the commerce of the South when the Nicaraguan Canal shall be opened, as I hope and trust it will be before a great many years.

But how long would it take us to do that? Why, Mr. President, under the stimulus of these bounties we should not do it under four or five years, and in the mean time the wooden ships and the steam-ships of different qualities and varieties engaged in the foreign trade, some of them with their lives nearly spent, some half spent, and so on, would have received the full measure of the bounty provided in this act, and we should be getting nothing. We should be paying the taxes all the time; we should be paying the money into the Treasury of the United States, out of which these subsidies are to be granted, but we should be getting nothing at all. The mere prospect of a future realization from this bounty would be all that we could count upon for the advantage of our ship-yards in those parts of the Union where we are not now prepared for the construction of ocean-going ships.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I wish to say that under the terms of this bill over one-half of all the tonnage of the United States engaged in the foreign trade is excluded. Those ships that the Senator talks about being old, etc., are all excluded.

Mr. MORGAN. The others would have a mighty good time, Mr. President. They would get the bounty and they would run down the other half that are already expiring anyhow, so weak that they can not stand up in battling with the elements and with the laws for many and many a year, and they would be obliged to go under. So we have got to sacrifice about one-half the ships we have got in order to get the bounty for the others under the provisions of this bill.

But the other part that would supply the half that is going now at the ship-yards to be constructed in different parts of the Atlantic States, I think, would look forward to an almost hopeless future. The rewards would be very distant, and I think that they would hardly ever be realized. I think we should get sick of the law and repeal it before we got down to the point where the men who invest their money in new localities would be able to turn ships out of their yards.

Mr. FRYE. I have no doubt, on the contrary, that the coal lying on the Tombigbee River and the Alabama River would be the coal supply for all the South American states on the eastern coast, Brazil, the Argentine Republic, and the Central American States.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, Mr. President, we can get coal from New Orleans, and Mobile, and Pensacola, and Tampa Bay to any part of the eastern Atlantic coast of South America at lower rates than the Senator from Maine says his ships built in Maine can afford to carry it for.

We were told by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] that the ocean was full of tramps, that they were ready to carry off the produce of the country, and that those and the regular lines did bring in all the vast production that we consumed from South America: hides, the different products of beef, and wool, and dye-woods, and hard woods, and fruits, and India rubber, and a great many valuable productions that are brought from South America to the United States. There appears to be not the slightest difficulty in the way in getting direct sail and steam transportation from any port in South America to any port in the United States, and we can do that at a lower rate on these vessels which are covered by the flags of Germany, France, Great Britain, and other countries than we can upon the ships that are American built, American owned, and under the American flag.

Now, when the Senator from Maine gets his ship subsidies, using the language of Mr. CANNON, which I read a moment ago, the freight is not reduced. The subsidy has no effect on freight. It remains just the same, and he can not afford to go even then and carry the coal from Alabama or Tennessee or Georgia out to sea and off to these foreign ports at a lower rate of freight than these foreign vessels and these tramps are charging. So the man who produces the coal gets no advantage from the bill at all, for it is a matter that does not add up in his account as to whether the coal for which he pays the freight is carried under an American flag or a German flag or under the flag of a tramp or the flag that is flown by some regular packet-ship. It does not cut any figure.

Mr. FRYE. The testimony of nearly all the gentlemen who appeared before the House committee in relation to that very point was that the men who sent freight would get nearly the whole benefit, and if not quite the bounty that the foreign ships now competing with them get just below their capacity to do business and to keep their ships afloat, and that the freights nearly inevitably, to the extent of the bounty, would go down.

Mr. MORGAN. It is not generally so, and it has not for that reason been the fact or the result in British experience.

The Senator from Missouri called attention the other day to the fact that not more than 2 per cent. of the commercial marine of Great Britain was subsidized in any form at all, whether by postal contract or otherwise, while that 2 per cent. by being subsidized is really placed in unfair competition with the other 98 per cent. of the British shipping. The general average of the prices of freight in British shipping has gone down. There has been a gradual sinking of freight rates resulting from universal competition now for several years past, but it can not be that this 98 per cent. of British ships have sunk their freight rates to correspond with the freight rates that 2 per cent. of that same shipping could afford to take in consequence of the bounty or in consequence of the postal subsidy that it is provided with by law.

Now, the fact of the business is this: The carrying trade of the ocean is overdone; that is the truth of it; and until that condition is altered freights must be carried by vessels at a losing rate. While that is true in respect of the carrying trade of the great oceans of the earth, the business of the interior communities of the United States is not only not overdone, but it is very prosperous and the fields are continually opening for additional commercial ventures and enterprises and the harvest of profits is continually growing and increasing throughout the United States; and if you would just give us a sound metallic currency as the basis of a paper currency, equivalent to the needs of the people of the United States for the conduct of their business, we should prosper in a degree that we have never yet experienced and a degree very much to be desired, because it would all be solid and substantial prosperity. There would not be any boom or inflation in it at all, but it would be solid and square through and through.

But, sir, we are not to expect people to withdraw their credit and to withdraw their money and to withdraw their enterprise from such vast and wonderful fields as are being opened in the United States now and will continue to be for the next thirty or fifty years to come, and, perhaps, longer than that, to go off into a field where the accumulated capital of the world has been invested under the incitements of bounties and subsidies in a business that will not pay a fair return on the capital invested. There is no occasion for undertaking competition of that kind. Our people get the advantage of it in lower rates, whether they get the benefit of it in the pride of their flag, commercially speaking, or not.

The advantage of it comes to us and the people are aware of it, and

I really see no occasion for changing that condition except in the instance I have referred to where I think it is proper and right that the American flag, and the American ship, and the American owner to buy an American ship—I mean an American-owned ship—ought to be united in the service of the Government, and it ought to be a fact as well as a theory that when a man steps upon an American ship and under the American flag he is upon American soil; that our laws attend these ships to whatever part of the world they visit, and can take care of our mails and the persons who are charged with them, and protect them against violence, and interference, and fraud, and everything of that kind just as much as we can do it upon the land in this country.

I believe it is our duty to spread the postal service across the seas as well as across the rivers; that it is as much our duty to cross the Gulf of Mexico with a postal service as to cross the Mississippi River. I can see no difference. I never could think that the Government of the United States was cramped and confined, in the organization and administration of its postal service, merely by the territorial land boundaries of this country. But it is quite a different thing when you come to subsidizing ships of commerce. That is a private transaction, in which the Government has no interest at all.

I feel, Mr. President, that it is hardly worth my while to undertake to occupy more of the time of the Senate in the discussion of this matter after the subject has been so thoroughly and so impartially presented in the report which I hold in my hand on both sides, the majority and minority, who deal with this subject in a spirit of fairness and of honest and sincere argumentation, and each side brings forward the facts upon which it predicates its opinions and conclusions. They do it faithfully and honestly and impartially, and I am very glad to say that about them, because it seems now to have presented the question before the Congress of the United States in such a fashion that we can form a final and conclusive judgment upon it. I must say that I believe if the Congress of the United States would follow its convictions upon this question and pass as a substitute for the bill of the Senator from Maine the bill reported by the minority of that committee (which is merely a bill to provide for free ships to be owned by American citizens and run under the American flag, without reference to the old restriction that has been so long an incubus upon our carrying trade) the question before us would be satisfactorily settled.

The Senator from Maine in the beginning of his remarks the other day in the Senate referred to a number of societies and individuals and corporations, commercial clubs, and chambers of commerce which advocated the passage of this bounty bill. I have attended several of those meetings and had occasion to listen to the debates that were conducted before them, and I think I do no injustice to the gentlemen concerned in them in saying that they have a very superficial view of these questions. They are questions which require a great deal more study than a man ordinarily is disposed to give to them unless he finds himself under the laboring oar of a pretty severe sense of duty. So I do not attach any very great importance to these petitions and recommendations which the Senator from Maine saw proper to read to the Senate.

But my colleague in the other House, Hon. JOSEPH WHEELER, has been for a number of years president, very prominent as president, of one of these commercial organizations. I am not prepared to say precisely which one, whether it was national or whether it was sectional; but it was a very large and influential body of men. They had a great many meetings, some of which I attended, at some of which I spoke, always opposing what I conceived to be the real purpose of that society, and I notice that General WHEELER is one of the minority that made up this report, of which Mr. FARQUHAR, of New York, was the chairman.

General WHEELER seems to have presented a very strong argument against the report of the majority of the committee, the soundness of all of which I think I am prepared to indorse, but it certainly is very strong; and if his calculations are correct in every particular it seems to me that he has thoroughly demolished the society of which he was president, and all the purposes that were involved in its organization. I will read it. It is brief.

The undersigned fully concurs with the majority of the committee in their views regarding the importance of some measure being adopted to revive American shipping, but it is with regret that he finds himself unable to support the bill H. R. 4653.

We now produce substantially one-third of the coal, iron-ore, pig-iron, finished iron and steel that is produced in the world, and yet we have but one-twentieth of the population of the earth.

It is therefore evident that a foreign market for our surplus products is necessary to our continued prosperity; but for the Government to give a bounty of 30 cents per registered ton for each 1,000 miles sailed by American ships is a questionable remedy. It would derange systems of traffic which have been adjusted after years of labor.

It must be expected that there are persons in this country who will avail themselves of all the advantages offered by the Government, and we must therefore inquire what results are possible under the bill should it become a law.

In European trade this bill would discriminate against all Atlantic cities in favor of San Francisco and other Pacific ports.

Wheat could be transported from California or Oregon to Liverpool and receive a bounty of 20 to 25 cents a bushel. It would also be possible to ship wheat from San Francisco, Cal., or Portland, Oregon, to some South American port and then reship to New York and other Atlantic cities, and receive from the Government 40 cents a bushel, thus militating against the wheat-growing interests of the Eastern States.

To illustrate: Suppose a ship of 4,000 tons, with 1,000 tons of wheat, sailed from Portland, Oregon, to some South American port, a distance of 7,000 miles; the ship would receive $8,400, that is, 7,000 miles at 30 cents a ton for every 1,000 miles sailed. The wheat could then be reshipped in a vessel of like character to New York, say 5,000 miles, and for this voyage the Government would pay $6,000. The same wheat could then be reshipped in a similar vessel for Liverpool, for which the Government would pay $3,600.

To illustrate the consequence of such a changed condition upon the wheat-growing section of the Middle and Eastern States, I will cite the following from a recent address by the president of the New York Produce Exchange:

"The difference in the cost of a single penny in laying down grain at Liverpool may determine the question whether millions of bushels shall be supplied by this country or shall be drawn from the ample fields of Hungary or Southern Russia."

It would be well for us to inquire if, under this bill, should it become a law, it would not become profitable to bring wheat from British India to New York.

Coal could be brought from Nova Scotia and compete with American coal in all our Atlantic ports, and by the use of the Welland Canal could compete with our coal in all the Lake cities. To illustrate: A 2,000-ton ship, carrying 500 tons of Nova Scotia coal for New York, would receive a bounty of $600, i. e., 30 cents a ton for 581 miles, and the duty on the coal would be $375, thus entering the coal free of duty and leaving the ship-owners $225 bounty.

Iron ore could be brought from Spain and draw a bounty from the Government of $4 per ton, and thus transfer the iron furnaces to the Atlantic coast. Under this law, the Government would pay a bounty upon all sugar and rice brought from the West India Islands to this country, thus enabling those foreign producers to more successfully compete with our home industries.

During the last few days petitions have been filed with Congress by the people of Knox County, Maine, claiming that they are being ruined by the competition of the lime-burners of St. John.

If the St. John people are given a bounty of from 60 cents to $1 per ton by the United States Government, what will become of industries of like character in Maine, when our duty on lime amounts to 3 cents per barrel, which is equal to 25 cents a ton?

Even if the bill should not cause any increase of American shipping in foreign trade, it would cost the Government from $3,000,000 to $4,000,000 annually.

If it should attain for us all the advantage that is insisted upon by the advocates of the bill and increase our foreign shipping to such an extent as to equal that of England, the annual cost would reach $30,000,000 and possibly $40,000,000.

These are but a few of the effects of legislation of this character. The bill is so far-reaching, that its full results could only be ascertained by actual experiment. It only illustrates the fatal tendency of class legislation and proves the soundness of the old Democratic axiom, "Justice to all, favors none."

There are many methods by which the merchant-marine of our country could be encouraged, if not entirely restored to its former prestige. First of all, we should revise our tariff so as to open trade with foreign countries. We should modify our navigation laws. We should also modify our laws and treaties, so as to lessen duties upon merchandise imported in American ships. Some judicious laws could be enacted authorizing contracts between our naval officials and ship companies, by which ship-builders could be aided, while at the same time a full equivalent would accrue to the Government.

In England and other European Governments such contracts are entered into, between ship-builders and ship-owners on the one side and the Government on the other, by which ship-builders agree to construct vessels, in accordance with plans and specifications which are submitted by the Government, of such type and speed as shall render them specially suitable for service as armed cruisers. The company also agrees to hold these ships ready for charter or purchase by the Government at rates fixed by the contract.

These vessels are required to have a speed of not less than 17 to 18 knots an hour. They are included in what is called the "reserve fleet of the Navy." Vessels thus constructed to meet the views of the admiralty would be at a disadvantage in respect to their cargo-carrying powers, and their additional cost of construction is considerable; therefore it would become necessary for the Government to offer a reasonable compensation to ship-builders and ship-owners to build and maintain this description of steamers.

The consideration paid by the English Government to the company for the vessel or vessels as approved by the admiralty is an annual subvention of about 15 shillings per gross registered ton for the period of not less than five years.

It will readily be observed that the existence of such vessels would, in a pecuniary sense, be of great advantage to the Government, as it would lessen the number of war-vessels which it would otherwise be necessary for the Government to maintain.

Mr. President, there is a case in which an honorable gentleman, who is connected with the legislation of the country, when he felt it incumbent upon him with the high duties and responsibilities of his position, in view of all the facts that had been laid before this committee, concluded to state these views, that the bill, which I believe is copied in the bill of the Senator from Maine, would inflict very serious injury upon a number of great industries of this country, and that it was violative of the principles of sound policy and of the old Democratic axiom "Justice to all and favors to none."

Upon that subject of "Justice to all and favors to none," I wish to call the attention of the Senate for just a moment to some remarks made by Captain Bates, who is our Commissioner of Navigation, who was examined before this committee of the House. Captain Bates, on the subject of "Tonnage increase," after having discussed the French system, the German system, the Italian system, the Norwegian system, goes on then to discuss the proposed system under the bill that was then under consideration. He says:

TONNAGE INCREASE.

Of sail and steam, for the first year we had an aggregate of 517,020 tons. To replace this amount in ten years requires new building at the rate of 51,702 tons annually. And with this amount of building there would be no increase of tonnage for ten years to come.

Taking the entire marine in the domestic trade and the rate of building in the past ten years, we find our ship-yards doing coast and ocean work have but little more capacity than to make good the average loss of about 41 per cent. During the year ending June 30, 1889, there was built, of sail-vessels, 49,340 tons, and of steamers, 33,250 tons; in the aggregate, 82,590 tons fit for ocean navigation.

It is plain, therefore, with the amount of Government work increased above last year, that new ship-yards must be established before much building can be done for the foreign trade. But it is unlikely that much will be added to our building facilities, particularly for steam tonnage of iron and steel, until a demand springs up for large ships and steamers in the place of the vessels now existing. When this demand will come must depend, not only on the amount of bounty paid, but very much on its utility and quickening power in the procurement of freights, for it must be evident our marine can not earn bounty without employment. And to get employment has been the chief difficulty, more especially in the case of sailing vessels.

In this connection it is important that the bounty to be paid shall be put at command of vessel-owners, so that it shall avail in the purchase of a part or the whole of cargoes. We should look to the chances of converting ship-owners of our own into merchants of our own. We should not expect to carry, principally, for the merchants of foreign nations, for all these, if they have not their own ships, have close business connections with the owners of their nation and will give the preference to their own flag.

That is a very candid and sincere avowal on the part of Captain Bates, our Commissioner of Navigation, of the reasons and inducements which lie at the bottom of this movement and the very natural gains amongst the men to be realized from these bounties, that it enables the merchant to purchase his cargo so that we are really to be supplying out of the Treasury of the United States capital to mercantile concerns to carry on business provided they will do it in American ships and American-built ships. Here is the translation of the whole business.

Mr. MORGAN. Page 261.

CONCLUSION.

To what extent the bounty bill, if passed, will increase the tonnage of our marine is not easy of prediction. It may well be regarded as a problem to be solved by trial. By the terms of the bill, reducing the bounty after ten years, there is no inducement to lay the foundation of great shipping-houses or to establish permanent agencies in foreign ports. This aspect of transitoriness is not much calculated to inspire ship-building, encourage ship-owning, or induce investment in commercial enterprises to be carried on with the world abroad. The bill seems to ask too little from the Government. Perhaps it is intended to test the principle of the protection which it offers. It will doubtless do much good—prevent the threatened destruction of our marine in the foreign trade. It will surely give us a much better class of vessels in ten years' time, but it is not so certain that the tonnage will be so much increased as to require, in any year of the operation of the bill, over five or six millions of dollars of bounty money.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your opinion as to the policy of excluding vessels under 400 or 500 tons from the benefits of this bill?

Captain BATES. We have 622 vessels, of from 100 to 500 tons. We are looking to this bill in the hope of raising men and officers for our Navy, in case we have trouble, and we have 622 masters, 622 mates, and sailors in proportion. Shall we throw all this naval school away or not? That is the question. I think the country would not approve of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question has come before the committee whether it is not throwing away money, as some express it, to pay for a tonnage of 100, 200, or 300. That is a question which will come up for action by this committee.

Captain BATES. If you do not protect that class of vessels, foreigners will furnish them.

The CHAIRMAN. The presumption on the part of the committee is that under this bill, while a proportion of the sail fleet may remain in service and receive its benefits, the new-built vessel is going to be steam.

Mr. WHEELER, of Michigan. The bill will induce people to build larger vessels; but this is a country of small things.

Captain BATES. The boys will have a better chance to get aboard of these sailing vessels than they will of the fine ships.

Mr. WHEELER, of Michigan. In raising seamen, you think the encouragement ought to be general?

Captain BATES. I think that is one of the advantages we would get.

Mr. BANKS. Raising seamen is one of the principal necessities.

Mr. President, on that subject, while the Senator from Maine was discussing this bill he stated two rather important facts. One was in reply to the Senator from Missouri that if one of these English iron ships was given to an American he could not earn money on it by running it. Of course, if it is a ship that can run, a ship fit for running, a ship called a tramp, to say the least, it may not be the fastest ship, but it is a ship fast enough for the conduct of very heavy articles of commerce—as, for instance, hauling cross-ties from Mobile, Ala., down to Nicaragua, or hauling granite from the Maine quarries to Washington City, on the Potomac, and the like of that.

A great deal of freight that is carried across the ocean is all the better and all the cheaper for being carried slow. Even cotton sometimes pays better to ship it on a slow ship than it does on a fast one, for the reason that after you get your cotton to Liverpool or Manchester, or wherever you expect to send it, if it is not to be consumed immediately, there are warehouse charges upon it, but on shipboard it pays nothing but freight, and it is as much under insurance on shipboard, and perhaps more, than it is on land and in the warehouse. So there is a great deal of the freight of the world, very heavy slow freight, that it does not make any particular difference what kind of a ship it goes on so that it gets to its destination safely, and it makes no special difference if the voyage is a slow one.

So I can not understand, Mr. President, how it is that the Senator from Maine should find himself justified in saying to the honorable Senator from Missouri, "If one of these British owners were to give you an iron ship you could not sail it so as to make anything out of it;" that it would not be of any advantage. Well, the business must be much overdone, freights must be exceedingly low, and there must be a very decided want of remuneration in such an investment as that.

I have no doubt the statement was made in absolute sincerity and upon a practical idea of the facts. Thereupon we commenced inquiring what it was that could make such a difference, and the Senator from Maine said that in sailing it under the American flag better living would be expected on board and the sailors would expect better wages. That is a curious sort of disadvantage to say that the humanity and decency of our living would cost so much to our people and that it should be so essential a feature in navigation under the American flag that we should come to the Treasury of the United States and fix up a boarding-house on a vessel for the Spanish or Norwegian sailor so as to give better quarters than he has got now. I do not see that there is any kindness in that, but I can see there is a great want of generosity towards the tax-payers of our country in a proceeding of that kind.

Then I was led to ask whether or not an American ship-master under the American flag taking his crew, for instance, at Liverpool, or at Lisbon, or at any Spanish port, would not get the sailors at as low a rate as a Spanish master could do. Yes, that is all true enough, he would get them at as low a rate as the Spanish master. Then why does he not take the Spanish sailor? He is just as useful, just as good, and you get him at a lower rate. Well, we know that is done continually. We know that it is done here amongst the fisheries of the United States, that they go to Canada for the purpose of getting the Kanucks there who perhaps are just as good fishermen, if not better than the Yankees. They take them aboard of their ships and carry them through the fishing season because they get a less "divide" out of the cargo of fish that is caught than the American fishermen.

It is true the world over, as Mr. Codman says and as other gentlemen say who have testified here, the ship-owner or the master of the ship when he is shipping his crew will always get the men he can get the cheapest provided they are serviceable, and if he can board a man for 37½ cents a day instead of a half-dollar he will board him for 37½ cents. Humanity, politeness, and decency of treatment do not enter into the consideration of these people. They do not think about such things.

What they want to know is how much money they can make out of a cargo, how much freight they can earn, and so it is that they are continually complaining of the Lloyds in England, and of the other Lloyds in North Germany and elsewhere, that they take advantage of American ships and put them in a false classification so as to throw down the rate of freight that they can get on board their ships. We are complaining continually, and this report is full of these complaints of the Lloyds, and yet that is a mere voluntary association, not incorporated by law, I believe, in either England or Germany. It is a large congregation of underwriters, who have their agents all assembled at a particular place, and when a man comes in for the purpose of getting his vessel insured there is a limit above which no company of underwriters is allowed to go, say £100 or £50, and they distribute it all around. There is a department there with men to examine the ship in every particular, from the highest point of the mast down to the keel, to see what condition it is in, and the ship is there rated, and according to the rating is the insurance, and according to the rating and insurance is the freight that is permitted to be asked in commercial circles or to be expected.

These combinations, of course, have wrought against the people of the United States, the ship-owners of the United States. It has occurred to me, although I am not sufficiently master of the subject to be able to trust my own judgment about it really, that we could with profit enact some law which would prevent the evil effects of these discriminations and place us where we could get the benefit of full and ample insurance without our ships being subjected to the discriminations that are being continually practiced against them at the Lloyds, both in England and in North Germany.

But now we come down to the last man in this question, except the man who goes aboard of the ship, and that is the sailor. I asked the Senator from Maine if he had any provision in his bill for taking better care of the sailors than is taken of them under the laws as they now exist, or for giving them higher wages. No; there is nothing of that kind. Commencing with the captain and going down to the ordinary seamen and the stokers on board a steam-ship and the cooks and the assistant cooks and so on, there is no increase of wages provided for.

There is no pressure brought to bear in this prize-money—for that is what it is—out of the Treasury of the United States upon which these men can get a "divvy." They have to go without anything. They are required to have so many American seamen the first three years, so many the next two years, and from that out to the other half of the ten years' term they are required to have so many American seamen on board a ship that receives a subsidy; but the seaman is not to receive anything. He gets no increase of wages; he gets nothing at all. So all of this prattle of these gentlemen here, witnesses and members of Congress, about the building up of seamanship and bodies of men to take charge of our ships in time of war as a result of this bounty bill is sheer nonsense, if you will allow me to say it.

An American sailor might just as well be on board a Chinese junk as on board an American ship, so far as the pay is concerned. He gets nothing out of this; the ship-master gets nothing out of it; the engineer gets nothing out of it; the captain gets nothing out of it. Nobody gets anything out of it except the ship-owner himself who puts his money in the ship. He is the man who receives the bounty, and then, according to Captain Bates, he may go abroad anywhere he pleases and use that money to buy a cargo to speculate upon and make it capital in mercantile trade between this country and foreign countries; and that is the pith, and the object, and the purpose, and the conclusion, and the result of this proposed law. So when we have passed this bill, if we shall pass it at all, we merely contribute to the private funds of the ship-owner so much money in consideration that other men risk their lives and health to sail his ship around the world so many miles and back, and is required to carry not a full cargo, but a fourth cargo.

If his ship is one of a thousand tons gross he can carry 250 tons and draw the bounty, and a man can lay in at Mobile 250 tons of cross-ties and carry them around the world to China and bring them back. That will not cost him $250 out of a thousand-ton ship and he will draw from three to six thousand dollars bounty upon the ship and cargo. That is the bill they ask us to pass, and it is to this absurd extreme that Senators and gentlemen, statesmen, able men, and good men are driven in order to avoid the cruel results of retaining upon our statute-book that old embarrassment of 1789 which excludes American money and American people from going out and buying a ship as they would buy a locomotive or as they would buy a horse or anything else and pay a duty upon it if you say so.

Certainly if your ship costs you $500,000 and it is worth it, value it and pay 10 per cent. or 20 per cent. ad valorem duty when it comes in, like any other imported goods, but when it gets here let the man use it for all it is worth. That is the true theory of government.

Mr. President, I have gone into this more than I intended to do. It is not a subject with which I am very familiar. It has not fallen within the line of the studies that belong to me according to the assignment of the Senate since I have had the honor to be a member of this body. But I could see in this bill—this is the first time it has come up squarely since I have been here—such a violation of the principles of good government and such a threat against the people that I peculiarly represent, the agricultural classes, that I felt obliged to say what I have said about it.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President—

Mr. FRYE. Allow me a word?

Mr. COKE. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I was sorry to hear the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] indorse the ship statements of his colleague, General WHEELER, and then on top of the indorsement use himself a like illustration of how a ship would make money by sailing on the bounty with only a very small cargo, one-quarter or one-tenth or something of that kind. I looked over the minority report drawn by the distinguished gentleman, and to anybody who knows about ships and the cost of sailing them it is utterly absurd.

In order to accompany the Senator's remarks and his indorsement of the illustration, I will ask leave to put in information which I received from a man who knows practically what he is talking about, showing just what would be the effect on a 4,000-ton ship carrying 1,000 tons cargo and taking the bounty in addition, and I ask the leave of the Senate, instead of reading it to the Senate, to print it in the RECORD.

Mr. MORGAN. What is it?

Mr. FRYE. A statement of what a 4,000-ton ship—

Mr. MORGAN. Whose statement?

Mr. FRYE. The statement of a gentleman whom I know to be practically acquainted with the running of ships.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read.

Mr. MORGAN. You do not give his name.

Mr. FRYE. No. I do not want to occupy the time of the Senator from Texas. I am ready to make a speech if the Senate will allow me to have it put in the RECORD—

Mr. COKE. I am entirely willing to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be read, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The argument in favor of a bounty to American ships is founded upon the fact that they can not compete with their foreign rivals for a share of the overseas carrying trade.

In the face of the testimony to this effect and the patent fact of the steady decadence of American shipping, Mr. WHEELER pictures a ship of 4,000 tons register (capable of carrying 6,000 tons weight), taking from port to port, 1,000 tons of wheat, and finding the freight on this mere fraction of a cargo so profitable that she could afford to turn over the entire bounty intended for her benefit to the owner of this 1,000 tons of wheat.

Of course, any one conversant with ship's accounts will see at once that the honorable gentleman has had no experience in such matters, but to those who, like himself, have no proper conception of the enormous expenses of a ship, the illustration is misleading.

There are no American sailing ships of 4,000 tons. Those built a dozen years ago are generally of 1,200 to 1,500 tons register and carry 40 to 50 per cent. in weight above their registered tonnage. The largest ship afloat is the Rappahannock (new), 1,385 tons. A ship of 4,000 tons register should carry 6,000 tons weight; 1,000 tons would about ballast her. Her ship's company would be in excess of forty persons. Her first cost would be approximately $50 per ton, or $200,000.

Besides all this, there would be the wastage and damage to the wheat and the interest and insurance on three voyages instead of one, to be borne by the cargo, and the impracticability of the whole proposition is too transparent to need further illustration of its absurdity. If the ship owned the cargo, loss would be $40,000.

Of course, most of the above figures are subject to modification by changed circumstances. The rate of freight might be more or less than 30s. per ton. In no possible way could such a subterfuge be of any advantage.

Mr. WHEELER speaks of a ship of 2,000 tons register taking 500 tons coal from Nova Scotia to New York to obtain $600 bounty. Such a ship would carry 3,000 tons, and the bounty would equal 20 cents per ton only on the cargo.

NEW YORK, April 12, 1890.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON]. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, does the Senator from Texas desire to go on?

Mr. COKE. I do not desire to proceed this evening, but I will speak this evening if such is the desire of the Senate.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] desires to address the Senate briefly in favor of his amendment, and I understand the Senator from Texas desires to address the Senate briefly, too, and that that is about the extent of further debate.

I have a very few matters I should like to put in, and I want to get a vote on these bills at the earliest possible moment. Therefore, with the permission of the Senate, I will say what I have to say now.

Mr. COCKRELL. How long?

Mr. FRYE. Fifteen or twenty minutes.

Mr. COKE. I will state to the Senator that I shall be very brief.

Mr. FRYE. I shall be very happy to have the Senator from Texas go on.

Mr. COKE. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator and will speak in the morning.

Mr. FRYE. I shall be happy to have the Senator go on if he desires. If the time is not to be occupied by others this evening, then I will occupy a brief space. I desire to give notice that I will endeavor to have the consideration of this bill proceed to-morrow morning immediately after the routine business, and finished.

Mr. HALE. And not wait until 2 o'clock?

Mr. VEST. That is only in the nature of a notice.

Mr. FRYE. Only in the nature of a notice.

Mr. VEST. We shall attend to that when the time comes.

Mr. FRYE. In some remarks I addressed to the Senate, a few days since, I made quotations from a report of Consul-General Russell, and at the same time requested that the report might be published as a part of my remarks, and consent was given by the Senate.

My attention was called a day or two afterwards to the fact that that report did not appear in my remarks as printed, and a Senator desired that it might be printed and appear in the RECORD, and therefore I ask again, Mr. President, that the report of Consul-General Russell may appear now as a part of my remarks. As I stated the substance of it the other day, I ask that it may be printed without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

The report is as follows:

No. 142.]

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Liverpool, November 18, 1887.

SIR: With a view to ascertaining the relative monthly rates of wages paid to officers and seamen of vessels of the United States with that of other nationalities, together with the cost of maintenance per man on board their respective vessels, I have compiled the following tables: (1) showing the wages paid; and (2) the cost of maintenance, together with the rates per centum less than those of the United States.

Reference to these tables will show that the vessels of the United States pay the highest rate of wages, besides costing more for maintenance of the crews than those of any other nation. This, of course, refers to voyages commencing in the United States, but even when they commence in foreign ports, that is, ship their crews and obtain their supplies at a foreign port, they then average higher rates than vessels of other nationalities as regards cost of maintenance. No comment is necessary in respect of the wages question, as the general labor market of the United States fixes that for shipments in home ports.

British vessels in domestic ports can procure crews for from 37 per cent. to 32 per cent. lower than those paid on American vessels, which is a serious item in the disbursement account. Then, again, the cost of maintenance on American ships is about 40 cents per day per man, against the English 29 cents, or a difference of 27 per cent. in favor of the latter.

When it is considered that provisions, such as beef, pork, and flour, which are the principal articles of food consumed, can be obtained in the United States, if anything, at a lower price than in England, it seems remarkable that the crews of our vessels should cost 27 per cent. more per man for maintenance; yet such appears to be the case. It is an acknowledged fact that the living on board our vessels is superior to that of other nations, and it is generally asserted that larger quantities of food are supplied to the crew, the scale of provision laid down by Congress being rarely if ever resorted to.

The wages paid on vessels belonging to Norway and Sweden, Russia, Germany, Denmark, Austria, and Spain average about 47 to 50 per cent. lower than those of United States vessels, and the cost of maintenance about 32 per cent. less, excepting those of Germany which cost about 10 per cent. less only.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, your obedient servant.

CHAS. T. RUSSELL, Consul.

Hon. JAMES D. PORTER,
Assistant Secretary of State.

Mr. FRYE. Now, Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senate to another thing which is to me somewhat remarkable. The Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] stated in his speech to-day that the difficulty about commerce was that we could not hope to have commercial exports to other countries and imports from other countries unless we established an entirely different rule from what governs us to-day. In other words, I suppose he intended to say that it was our tariff which was interfering in this matter, and that of course we could not have a carrying trade if we did not have commerce. I went out and from papers that I had in my possession I gathered the following facts as to commerce, which I desire to put into this case:

Imports and exports.

Period.	Value of imports.	Value of exports.	Total.
1790 to 1820, inclusive	$2,250,628,238	$1,839,008,869	$4,189,637,107
1821 to 1845, inclusive	2,401,951,443	2,236,019,315	4,637,970,758
1846 to 1861, inclusive	3,687,572,980	2,367,586,492	6,055,159,472
1862 to 1889, inclusive	14,514,129,670	15,010,243,751	29,524,373,421

Total imports and exports 1790 to 1889, inclusive.

Period.	Imports.	Exports.	Total.
1790 to 1861	$3,590,152,611	$7,462,709,176	$10,052,861,787
1862 to 1889	14,514,129,670	15,010,243,751	29,524,373,421
Excess in value of imports and exports from 1862 to 1889 over those of 1790 to 1861			13,471,611,634

From the day of the acceptance of the Constitution of the United States down to 1861 our exports and imports were $16,052,761,787, and from 1861 down to now, $29,524,373,421.

I made myself a brief calculation of certain voyages under what is known as the postal-subsidy bill. In the left-hand column I have put in what it would cost a ship a year under the tonnage bill; in the right-hand column what it would cost the same ship under the postal-subsidy bill; and with the leave of the Senate I will print that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. FRYE. As to the cost (and it is the great cost which would attract attention) of a line of ships between New York and Liverpool at $6 a mile the outward voyage, making a little over $800,000 for four great ships, I have to say this: In every case in that bill there has been a limit beyond which the Postmaster-General should not go, but not a limit below which he might make his contract. In every contract for carrying the mail from the Pacific coast there undoubtedly would be competition. In every contract for carrying the mail across the Caribbean Sea and the Gulf of Mexico there would be competition. Between New York and the river Plate there would not be competition for a while; when the first contract was made there probably would be none; very likely the Postmaster-General might pay the amount provided for in this bill, but there is one thing which might relieve him from doing that, and which probably would. Brazil and the Argentine Republic would help pay for the 16-knot vessels which should be provided for under this bill between New York and the river Plate, so that in all human probability the cost there would be less than the extreme limit which is put in this bill.

I said between New York and Liverpool there probably would be no reduction of cost because there would be no competition whatever. But suppose you got four ships of 8,000 tons each and 20 knots an hour. Those four ships, built as the bill provides, would be worth more in the event of war than one of these great line-of-battle ships which cost $3,000,000, and costs undoubtedly the United States every year to keep it in commission and service from four to five hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. MORGAN. We have not any such four ships now?

Mr. FRYE. No; four ships I say that would be built under the postal-subsidy bill. Suppose it did cost, I say, $800,000 a year and the United States paid it, as the result of those four ships of 8,000 tons each, put upon the line between New York and Liverpool, built as the bill provides they should be built, they would occupy the place fully in service in case of war that one of the great line-of-battle ships would occupy.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator tell us how long it would take to build those four ships?

Mr. FRYE. I have no doubt it would take two years and a half.

Mr. MORGAN. Then what would they cost, each of them?

Mr. FRYE. They would cost over a million dollars each. So in these figures showing the cost of the voyage for the mail service I give the extreme limit of cost, when I do not believe that it would reach it or anything like it. Under the postal subsidy bill, from the best examination I have been able to give it, in my judgment it would not cost the United States for the next two years the net profit the United States to-day makes from carrying the foreign mails; that is, in the neighborhood of $900,000. The third year it would cost more, because by the time the third year came around you would have some of these great ships.

Now, there is another thing I want to call the attention of the Senate to, and lest any one should question about this matter of the Government's profit from carrying our mails, I desire to read from the last report of the Superintendent of Foreign Mails:

From the postmasters' reports, which form the basis of Table D, it appears that of the aggregate sum of $2,343,923.27 estimated in said table to have been received by this Department as postage on articles exchanged with all foreign countries, the postage collected on the articles exchanged with foreign countries other than Canada and Mexico amounted to $1,728,743.17, or more than three times the net cost of the service.

What Senator can object to paying for carrying the United States mails under the American flag what it costs? There is not a State south of where I stand this moment where the United States does not pay more for the transportation of mails than it receives from the letters, and there are not more than half a dozen States in the Union where the United States does not pay more than it receives from the mails for carrying the mails. Why should any Senator object to paying that amount for carrying the United States mails on the ocean?

The Senator from Alabama read from a statement of Mr. Bates, the Commissioner of Navigation, touching the cost of what is known as the tonnage bill, the number of vessels employed, etc., and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON], in his speech made two or three days since (and he is a Senator who would not make a misstatement understandingly under any circumstances), also made his estimate of the cost of this bill, and he made it about $7,000,000 a year. He was entirely mistaken, and only made the grievous error from not examining carefully the subject he was discussing. His statement was that our registered ships amounted to 800,000 tons; that you pay 30 cents a thousand miles travel on 800,000 tons of registered shipping, and it would amount to about $7,000,000 a year.

The Senator ignored entirely every limitation that is contained in the bill. He ignored the limitation to 500 tons burden. What does that mean? We have tonnage about 4,500,000 tons, and 1,620,000 tons are in vessels less than 500 tons burden. That is to say, of all the vessels owned in the United States over one-third are below a 500-ton vessel. I will admit that in the registered tonnage that proportion will not hold good, but in registered tonnage of all the vessels of the United States registered to-day over one-quarter in number are less than 500 tons, and therefore they would be excluded from the bill. The Senator from Maryland ignored that entirely in his statement of the cost.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland. The Senator is mistaken. I especially deducted 200,000 tons for vessels that were under 500 tons.

Mr. FRYE. I do not see how the Senator, then, could make the mistake he did make.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland. And also 100,000 tons on account of the inspection laws.

Mr. FRYE. I did not hear that; but how the Senator, then, could have made it cost $7,000,000 is beyond my comprehension. I did not hear that statement of the Senator, and I have not seen his speech yet in the RECORD. Has it been published yet?

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland. No, sir.

Mr. FRYE. That is what I thought. I examined twice to see it and it has not appeared.

The bill has a certain requirement as to classification under the law. It is a matter of American registry. Now, that classification would exclude one-half of all the vessels of the United States registered to-day. So there would not be over 300,000 tons of vessels left that would receive bounty under the bill to-day.

I was saying that Mr. Bates made a statement before the committee touching these same things, and his statement there does not apply to the bill here because a limitation of 500 tons has been put in since he made his statement, and two or three other limitations contained in the bill have been put in. He has revised that statement and I have it here, addressed to the chairman of the House Committee on Marine and Fisheries, in which he goes into the matter at length very carefully, and so that Senators may have an intelligent idea of what this bill is likely to cost if it becomes a law I ask leave to present this statement of the Commissioner of Navigation and have it printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

The statement referred to is as follows:

ESTIMATES FOR NAVIGATION BOUNTIES.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF NAVIGATION,
May 21, 1890.

SIR: As it may be expected that persons unacquainted with the state of your marine, both in home and foreign trade, may have an idea that the payment of bounties to vessel trading abroad would call for great sums of money for the first and the following years of the life of the bill, at your request I have revised the method of my first estimate, and made a closer approximation of annual payments; have also made a calculation of what the amount would be the first year, if all our salt-water vessels of the size, class, and grade named in the bill could find business in the foreign trade, as, of course, they could not do.

REVIEW OF FORMER ESTIMATES—THE TONNAGE.

For want of time to examine books of classification, my former estimate of tonnage qualified for bounty earning was based upon the ages of vessels, and is somewhat in excess. In the present investigation the Shipmasters' Record, of New York, has been consulted, and a closer approximation made. The facts discovered concerning the condition of our marine will surprise even the best informed. Of the salt-vessels above 500 tons, in both foreign and domestic trade, whose measurement foots up to 901,244 tons, there are only 500,876 tons that are classed in the Record A 1 and A 1½. In other words, only 55.5 per cent. of either of the fleets, foreign or domestic, are qualified for bounty-earning. In my statement, page 257 of the Report of Hearings, the salt tonnage computed as equivalent to permanently employed was 543,696 tons. Of this amount I estimated 70 per cent. was A 2 or higher, namely, 380,587 tons.

The change in the bill of class limit from A 1 to A 1½, and the decrease from 70 to 55.5 per cent. of fleet tallying therewith, will lower the amount of salt tonnage from 422,938 to 301,751 tons for the qualified fleet last year in the foreign trade. As a year will have elapsed from the date of these statistics to the probable time of passing the bill, deduction should be made for one year's losses from the perils of navigation (3.63 per cent.), and for lapsing from class (6.37 per cent.), together 10 per cent., making the amount of tonnage to start with next year (1891) 271,576 tons. To this should be added about half the tonnage that will be built during the year. In 1889, the amount built of salt above 500 tons was 21,335 tons (or 2.36 per cent. only of the salt-water sail of 901,244); in the same year the losses of registered tonnage amounted to 3.63 per cent. If we allow for doubling in 1891 the tonnage built in 1889, and add half of it to 271,576, we shall have 292,911 tons as amount of sail for bounty earning in the first year of the operation of the bill.

With regard to the steamers my first estimate fixed upon 151,316 tons, which was cut down by one year's losses (estimated at 10 per cent.) to 136,285 tons. It is found on consulting the Record that the whole tonnage of screw-steamers above 500 tons classed A 1, thirteen years and upward, sums up to 156,606 tons. As the whole amount of steam last year registered and assumed to be in the foreign trade was 194,471 tons, it would appear that 80 per cent. of our steamers in the foreign trade are qualified by size and class for bounty earning. Taking the new figure of 156,606 tons and deducting 3 per cent. for one year's losses from the perils of navigation and 5 per cent. for lapsing from class, making together 8 per cent., we have 144,078 tons to start with in the first year. To this should be added about one-third of the tonnage that will be built during the year. In 1889 the amount built of steam tonnage above 500 tons was 17,352 tons. This will give a result of 159,062 tons as amount for bounty earning in the first year.

THE MILEAGE THAT MAY BE MADE.

In my first estimate it was assumed that the sailing vessels would probably navigate an average distance of 18,000 miles annually, and steamers of 42,000 miles annually; but the changes in the bill limiting the bounty in any voyage to 7,000 miles, although many voyages will be double this distance, and confining the payments to voyages made direct to or from a foreign country will have the effect of reducing this estimate largely in the case of sailing vessels and to some extent in the case of steamers. The following examples of actual navigation will illustrate the operation of the bill as reported to the House:

Ship I. F. Chapman, New York to San Francisco, thence to Liverpool, and return to New York in thirteen and one-half months, would sail 31,000 miles, but make in bounty mileage only 10,010 miles.

Ship L. Schepp, New York to Yokohama, thence to Manila, and return to New York in fifteen months, would sail 36,000 miles, but make in paying distance only 14,000 miles.

Ship Santa Clara, New York to Melbourne, thence to Newcastle, New South Wales, thence to Manila, and return to New York in seventeen and one-half months, would sail 36,000 miles, but make in mileage measurement only 14,000 miles.

Ship Daniel Barnes, New York to Melbourne, thence to Newcastle, New South Wales, thence to Honolulu, thence to Hong-Kong, and return to New York in sixteen months, would sail 39,000 miles, but make in bounty mileage only 14,000 miles.

The average bounty mileage of these ships would be only 10,060 miles a year. It also appears from actual transatlantic voyages that 18,000 miles annual mileage is too much for them, though all the distance made be allowed. The following examples illustrate this point:

Bark H. L. Routh, 1,023 tons, New Orleans to Lisbon, and thence to New York, five and one-third months, distance 7,300 miles.

Ship City of Montreal, 1,116 tons, New York to Rotterdam and back, five months, distance 6,400 miles.

Ship M. Nottebohm, 1,116 tons, New York to Bordeaux and back, five months, distance 6,200 miles.

Ship Fawn, 1,915 tons, New York to Amsterdam and back, five months, 6,400 miles.

The average bounty mileage of these ships is at the rate of 15,523 annually. If we average the mileage of these ships with that of those above, around the capes, we shall have a result of 12,791 miles.

Adopting 13,000 miles of distance as a probable bounty mileage that will be made by the sailing fleet, we shall have 292,911 tons multiplied by 13,000 as the ton-miles; and this product, by three-tenths of a mill, will be $1,142,352.

As we have now a few steamers running to foreign ports, and between other foreign ports, before returning home, and this sort of navigation is likely to be increased, perhaps largely; and as there is to be no bounty paid on running between foreign ports, my former estimate of 42,000 miles per annum is too large for average steamer mileage. It is believed on review that 35,000 miles for bounty earning would be a fair estimate as the bill now stands. We shall have, therefore, 159,062 tons multiplied by 35,000 as the ton-miles; and this product, by three-tenths of a mill, will be $1,575,651.

THE TOTAL OF BOUNTIES.

By these statements for sail and steam we have for the total of bounty payments the first year the amount of $2,718,004. If we add to this 10 per cent. for fullness of estimation, the sum would scarcely reach a round $3,000,000.

THE UTMOST LIMIT OF BOUNTY EARNINGS.

But, as it may be thought the vessels usually employed in the coasting trade might enter the foreign trade, under the allurement of bounty pay, we will now include in our estimate all of the qualified salt-water tonnage of the United States. To do this, as all the qualified steam tonnage is already included, it will only be necessary to take the entire qualified sail tonnage, found by the "Record" to be 500,876 tons, and make the reductions and additions which were made to the amount in the foreign trade, 301,751 tons, and the result sought will be found, namely, 472,124 tons. This is an increase of 62 per cent., and would add $698,929 to $2,718,004, making $3,416,933 the total of bounty payments the first year, supposing it possible to put into the foreign trade all the shipping qualified under the bill.

PAYMENTS OF FOLLOWING YEARS.

Before we can estimate beyond the first year it will be necessary to examine and learn the class endurance, or lifetime, remaining to our vessels now in service, and speculate somewhat on the power of the law to increase the tonnage. The Record of American and Foreign Shipping, of New York, supplies the data for the following tables:

American sail-vessels—wood.

Classed in the Record:

Number of vessels A1: 1886, 559; 1890, 497.
Amount of tonnage A1: 1886, 532,822; 1890, 464,631.
Falling off in number, four years, 11 per cent.
Falling off in tonnage, four years, 10 per cent.
Number of vessels A1½: 1886, 60; 1890, 42.
Amount of tonnage A1½: 1886, 53,561; 1890, 36,245.
Falling off in number, four years, 30 per cent.
Falling off in tonnage, four years, 32 per cent.
Number of vessels A1 and A1½: 1886, 619; 1890, 539.
Amount of tonnage A1 and A1½: 1886, 586,473; 1890, 500,876.
Falling off in number, four years, 13 per cent.
Falling off in tonnage, four years, 14.5 per cent.
Average time until the expiration of class:
For A1 vessels (above 500 tons), 1886, 6.55 years; 1890, 5.46 years.
For A1½ vessels (above 500 tons), 1886, 2.31 years; 1890, 1.97 years.

American steam-vessels—iron.

Classed in the Record:

Number of vessels A1, thirteen to twenty years: 1886, 77; 1890, 94.
Amount of tonnage A1, thirteen to twenty years, 1886: 130,909; 1890, 156,606.
Increase in number, four years, 17 per cent.
Increase in tonnage, four years, 16.4 per cent.
Average time till expiration of class, in years: 1886, 12.35; 1890, 9.22.

From these tables it is plain, for four years past, there has not been building enough by 3.6 per cent, annually to keep up the figures of first-class sail tonnage in both foreign and coasting trades. It also appears that all the sail capacity eligible for bounty earning was 500,876 tons, December, 1889. Of this amount 60 per cent, was in the foreign trade, and 40 per cent, in the coasting trade. And the total steam capacity was 156,606 tons, all of it reckoned as in the foreign trade. The lapsing of these fleets from class would be as follows:

For sail:

In four years, all the A1½ vessels, 36,245 tons.
In five and one-half years, half the A1 vessels, 232,315 tons.
In eleven and one-half years, other half the A1 vessels, 232,315 tons.
Of the vessels surviving the perils of the sea, the A1, if found worthy, may be continued, or pass down to A1½ grade; the A1½ may be continued or find place in the lower grades. Vessels meriting these continuations are exceptional in character, and the terms given are short. They may be fairly averaged at one year for the fleet of A1, and at two plus one, equal to three years, for the fleet of A1½ vessels. Including losses at sea the lapsing from class may be treated as follows:

For sail.

	Tons.
In five years, all the A1½ vessels.....	36,245
In seven years, half the A1 vessels.....	232,315
In thirteen years, other half A1 vessels.....	232,315
In the order of time the falling off would be as follows:
	Tons.
In the first, second, third, fourth, and fifth years.....	58,307
In the sixth and seventh years.....	51,038
In each of six years following.....	17,870

For steam.

The lapsing of steamers from class would be as follows:

	Tons.
In nine and one-fourth years, half the tonnage, or.....	78,303
In sixteen years, other half of tonnage.....	78,303

Of the vessels surviving some may be continued. For this an average of two years may be allowed. Including losses at sea the lapsing from class may be taken as follows:

	Tons.
In each of first ten years.....	12,724
In each of seven years following.....	4,894

The amount of building to keep up the different fleets now existing being thus brought to view, it may be stated that 58,307 plus 12,724, equal to 71,031 tons of sail and steam, need be built the first year. Last year there was built of sail above 500 tons 21,335 tons; of steam, 17,952 tons; total, 39,287 tons.

Thus, to enlarge our marine at all we must double the amount of building in recent years. To change gradually from sail to steam tonnage we shall have to treble our building expenditures; and with such increase our tonnage would not be greater in ten years than it is at present, though our shipping then would have threefold efficiency and double the class duration.

As the entire tonnage of all kinds, ocean, lake, and river, built last year was 231,134 tons and the proportion qualified to enter the foreign trade was only 17 per cent, of this total, it may be a matter of surprise that there is so little building of the larger vessels. Sloop, barge, and canal-boat building, steam-boat, tug, and fishing boat building burden our statistics with tonnage, but do not provide yards, shops, and engine-works, shipwrights, engineers, and tools for genuine ship-work, such as must be done to construct vessels fit for foreign carrying trade. The greater number of mechanics employed in turning out tonnage for inferior purposes have neither the training nor the tools to build ships of wood or metal.

It is, therefore, apparent that the second year of the new law will see but little addition to the tonnage of the first. There was a small apparent gain last year in our steam shipping in the foreign trade, but, as our investigation shows that our A1 sail-vessels have only 83 per cent, of remaining class time that they had four years ago, and that our steamers are worse off still, having only 75 per cent, of the class life before them in 1886, it is certain there was no real improvement in the situation. Not only are ships in the foreign trade lapsing fast from class, but the larger craft in the coasting trade, steam as well as sail, are growing older and losing fitness for their work.

So dead is the building for foreign trade that of the vessels launched and contracted for in Maine in the past five months 93 per cent, are for the protected home service.

Considering all the circumstances of our marine and carefully anticipating the effect of the law, the following table is offered as a solution of the problem, what will it cost annually for the next ten years and for the lifetime of the measure?

Probable increase of marine and bounty payments for ten years to come.

Years.	Sail tonnage.	Steam tonnage.	Bounty payments.
1891.....	292,911	150,062	$2,718,004
1892.....	325,000	175,000	3,105,000
1893.....	335,000	225,000	3,699,000
1894.....	340,000	305,000	4,528,500
1895.....	347,000	383,000	5,374,800
1896.....	345,000	460,000	6,175,500
1897.....	340,000	520,000	6,786,000
1898.....	340,000	560,000	7,167,000
1899.....	320,000	575,000	7,284,500
1900.....	300,000	565,000	7,102,500
Average annual payments.....			5,391,080

The average for each year of the ton is $128,460,248.

The culmination of payments would occur in 1899. After 1900 the bounty would decrease one-tenth each year. By 1910 it would cease. The average annual payments for the last nine years would probably amount to $2,695,540, and for each of the nineteen years of the law's operation the average annual expenditure would be $4,114,245.

COMMERCIAL CONSEQUENCES.

With regard to the commercial consequences of thus supporting and encouraging our marine in foreign trade it might be fitting to say a few words, or to offer a reasonable speculation upon their amount. It is, of course, well understood that a merchant marine actively employed sets in motion many pursuits and creates many callings besides those peculiarly its own. These are so many that a detail would be tedious. I will therefore include only the chief trades and transactions, namely, ship-building, freighting, merchandising, insurance, and banking, in the totals of the estimate which follows:

Minimum amount of total business for ten years.

Year.	Total business.	Year.	Total business.
1891.....	$47,442,800	1896.....	$151,819,220
1892.....	66,577,360	1897.....	167,310,080
1893.....	80,312,620	1898.....	178,169,880
1894.....	106,336,020	1899.....	182,645,610
1895.....	130,901,820	1900.....	173,657,040

The bounty paid for this business would amount, by the figures, to 4½ per cent, only. But, as the law would run nineteen years, and the average of business for ten years might be expected to continue for the time following, it results that only 2½ per cent, per annum would stand for the commission or protection paid for an American foreign commerce and carrying trade for the whole term of the law's existence.

It may therefore be summed up that the bounty would represent a very low premium on the business transacted, whether great or small, by and through the merchant marine; at once the budget of honest toil, the means of enterprise and wealth, and the solid base of national rank and power.

Very respectfully yours,

WM. W. BATES, Commissioner.

Hon. JOHN M. FARQUHAR,

Chairman Committee on Marine and Fisheries,

House of Representatives.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, as to the reasonableness of the United States doing something for its vessels I read from the report of the Postmaster-General, showing what this country made every year out of its foreign mail service. To me it is utterly inexcusable. It has made over $10,000,000 out of this foreign mail service in the last fifteen years. In the last twelve years it has made over $9,000,000 out of the foreign mail service. If you can show me where it has made anything out of the mail service in any of the States, on any of the rivers, in any of the coastwise-trade vessels, I should be glad to know where it is. The United States makes a profit alone in the foreign mail service. I say it is the duty of the United States to take that money it makes out of its foreign mail service and do something to put its mails under an American flag, and that no Senator ought to object to.

Now, take another thing. We have collected tonnage taxes since 1863 to the amount of $30,364,000, and so far as that tonnage tax has been collected from American vessels up to 1894, when we passed our shipping act, the vessels never had received one dollar of benefit from the United States. When we passed that act they did, because the United States then assumed the payments which those vessels had been compelled to make for consular fees and almost everything else; but up to that time the United States had given nothing in return for that taxation; and yet in every State in the United States up to within the last eight years those ships have been compelled to bear their equal burden of taxation with all other property in the States, while Great Britain taxes not a single ship, not a single line, only puts a bit of an income tax on the net income derived from the line.

During the war what protection did our ships get? That is the time when the Government owes protection to its ships if it ever does. That is the time when our ship-owners need Government protection. They had absolutely none, and hundreds and hundreds of thousands of tons were compelled to go under a foreign flag, under an anonymous sail, in order to keep upon the ocean at all, and those vessels that remained under our flag were compelled to pay an enormous insurance premium to keep there, the United States doing absolutely nothing for them.

Now, why should not the United States in justice do something for its ships? Is it too much to ask that it shall take from its tonnage tax; is it too much to ask that it shall take from its net profits on the foreign mail service and pay something to carry the mails under the flag?

Mr. President, I feel an intense interest in these bills, in both of them. From my situation early in life my attention has been called more than that of most Senators to the subject of ships and shipping. I have labored ever since I have been here, in both Houses, in season, and many Senators will say out of season, in the matter of relief to the merchant marine. A great deal has been accomplished, I admit; and yet, as I said the other day, in the foreign carrying trade we are dead. In my opinion if either one of these bills passes the Senate and becomes a law, the first real step for the resurrection of this dead body will have been accomplished.

There never has been a time in the twenty years I have served here so opportune as this. Capital is seeking everywhere investment, no longer so anxious for the public domain, becoming a little uncertain about mortgages in the West, looking around now to see where it shall go. The sentiment of the country has been aroused and the people are looking to see whether something can not be done.

The ship-yards of this country in their capacity for building great ships have doubled in five years. There is not a ship to-day can be called for that can not be provided by our own ship-yards. Their capacity is not what it ought to be. There ought to be beyond any question a great iron-ship yard on the Alabama River.

Let these bills, or either of them, become a law and that ship-yard will be established there, and iron ships will be built there. We have not to-day half the capacity we ought to have for building these great ships, but yet we have double, as I said, what we had five years ago. There is nothing this nation desires to do that it can not do when the necessity is upon us. Nobody dreamed four years ago that you could build two great iron war-ships in San Francisco, and yet they have been built.

Mr. President, I hope that to-morrow we shall get a vote on these bills. I earnestly hope that both bills will be sent to the other House. I believe that one of them will become a law if they are both sent to that body.

Mr. MANDERSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. VEST. Let us adjourn.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have read the following from the Post, of this city, which I send to the Clerk's desk.
The Clerk read as follows:

NO AGREEMENT ON THE SILVER BILL.

The Republican members of the conference committee on the silver bill were in session yesterday. It was the intention to hold a regular conference, but Representative BLAND, of the House conferees, and Senator HARRIS, of the Senate conferees, were both absent. The principal topic discussed, it is understood, was in regard to the amount of silver to be purchased monthly—whether it shall be 4,500,000 ounces or $4,500,000 worth.

The proposition to strike out the bullion-redemption feature was also a subject of some discussion. No final decision on either point was arrived at when the meeting adjourned.

It is expected that the conferees will meet early next week.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, in order that I may not be put in a false light, as not having attended to my duties in not being present at that conference committee meeting, I desire to have the following read.

The Clerk read as follows:

ROOM OF COMMITTEE ON COINAGE, WEIGHTS, AND MEASURES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., July 3, 1890.

DEAR MR. BLAND: I saw Senator SHERMAN after our adjournment and we concluded not to have a meeting of the conference on Saturday. Will notify you in time of next meeting.

Respectfully,

E. H. CONGER.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that at our meeting on Thursday last it was understood that the conference committee was to meet again at 11 o'clock last Saturday, but on Friday evening I received that note from the chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures [Mr. CONGER], notifying me that the meeting would not be held, and hence my absence. I do not understand why the statement should have been published that I was not present, I having been notified that there would be no meeting. I do not see present this morning the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CONGER], chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, who sent me that note. I have been informed, however, that it was an effort on the part of the Republican conferees to reach some conclusion at the meeting which was held. If the committee of conference is to degenerate into a Republican caucus, as a matter of course I will not be present; but I am always present when notified that there will be a meeting at which an effort will be made to come to some reasonable legislation upon this subject. I do not desire, therefore, to be advertised as being absent and not attending to my duties, the fact being that I was notified that my presence was not desired.

SETTLERS ON OMAHA INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. DORSEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask for its consideration by the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring). That the President be requested to return to the House of Representatives the bill (H. R. 5974) extending the time of payment of purchasers of land to the Omaha tribe of Indians in the State of Nebraska, and for other purposes.

Mr. ROGERS. I demand the regular order.

Mr. DORSEY. This is the regular order. This is the day for suspension of the rules. I move that the rules be suspended and that this resolution be placed on its passage.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. The question is whether it is within the power of the House or of Congress, when a bill has passed both Houses, when a motion has been made to reconsider the vote by which it was passed, and that motion laid on the table, to recall such a bill from the President. It has heretofore been a mere matter of courtesy, and the Constitution gives the House no power to recall a bill after it has passed both Houses and gone to the President. The President has ten days in which to sign it and return it or allow it to become a law without his signature; but there is no provision under our rules giving to the two Houses the power to recall it.

There are no joint rules between the House and the Senate, and we could not have considered this bill in the House after the bill had been passed and a motion to reconsider been made and laid upon the table. So that the matter, therefore, is out of the power of the House; and I respectfully submit that it is out of order, according to our rules, in this indirect way, to reconsider the action of the House in passing the bill, and that it is beyond the constitutional power of Congress to recall a bill from the President. Whatever of precedent has been made has been simply because the question has not been raised.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not undertake to pass upon the constitutional question, but that action has been taken by Congress from time immemorial and how the House shall act upon it is for the House to determine.

Mr. DORSEY. This is simply to make a correction, and I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will withdraw his objection.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. It is a much graver question in reality than that, because it affects the relations of the Congress to the President. It is a question that may go to the validity of an act of Congress, for if it be correct that Congress has not this power and the ten days expire while we are recalling a bill, the act becomes valid without the approval of the President. So that it goes to the very gist of the power of Congress in such matters and the relation of Congress to the President as well as the validity of the act improperly and illegally called back.

Mr. DORSEY. It has been the custom of the House to take such action as this heretofore. It was done in the last Congress, and it has been done in the present Congress.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I make the additional point of order that heretofore the practice of the House in questions of this kind has been uniformly by unanimous consent. There has been no precedent for a resolution of this kind to recall a bill, and it is subject to this point of order.

Mr. DORSEY. I ask my friend to make no objection, and let us have this resolution passed by unanimous consent. It is simply to correct an error.

Mr. BYNUM. I do not understand that it is simply to correct an error, but to remove an objection of the President, and if that objection be not removed possibly he would veto the bill.

Mr. DORSEY. Oh, no. I do not understand that the President would veto the bill. It is simply a bill which allows the State of Nebraska to tax this land before the patent is issued by the Government. That is all there is in it, and it is in the interest of about six hundred settlers on this land. Their time expired on the 1st of July without their having paid up. The bill is satisfactory to the Indians. The Government holds the funds simply as the trustee of the Indians. The Indians ask that it be passed, and so do the settlers. It has passed both branches of Congress. It was reported unanimously without objection in either House, and is a very simple matter in the interest of six hundred honest, hard-working settlers on the public domain.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, we have been doing business in a very loose, irregular way, and I think it is time that it should cease; and I decline to withdraw the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, is this a resolution asking the President to return a bill that has been sent to him? The point of order, as I understand it, is that it is not in order to introduce a resolution and consider the same.

The SPEAKER. That is the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. Just a single word. From time immemorial, as I understand, the practice has been uniform and unbroken to introduce these resolutions between the two branches of the Congress, and also touching the co-ordinate branch of Congress, the President; and from necessity, it seems to me, that that having been the practice in the absence of rules, it is a question of the highest privilege, for the purpose of bringing the co-ordinate branches of the Government together and for the purpose of correcting a mistake.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, as the point of order is made, it is of the utmost importance that we should adopt the right practice. I know that two or three times this session such resolutions have passed, but it is my memory that it was done by unanimous consent; certainly there was never a claim that it was a privileged matter. Now, it is well for us, as the point of order is made, to see what it would lead to if it is held to be the right of any member of this House to introduce a resolution calling back a proposition of this kind from the President.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. McMILLIN. With pleasure.

Mr. CANNON. I understand that this is a concurrent resolution, involving the action of the two co-ordinate branches of the Legislature, addressed to the third co-ordinate branch, the President.

The SPEAKER. This is a proposition to suspend the rules.

Mr. McMILLIN. To suspend the rules and pass the resolution?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. McMILLIN. I was under the impression that it was a proposition similar to several that have come up here lately. Then the question is simply as to the rights of the President and of the two branches of Congress after the bill has gone to him.

Mr. DORSEY. All three would have to concur to secure the desired action.

Mr. McMILLIN. But if the President declines to send back the bill, what remedy have you?

Mr. DORSEY. None whatever.

Mr. McMILLIN. You have no remedy against the President in the event of his refusing; and if he may send it back or not, as he pleases, we have no right to demand it of him.

Mr. DORSEY. This is a request that the President return the bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. But suppose he declines, then we have been engaged in mere child's play, it seems to me. Now there is a plain remedy in this case. The Constitution lays down that remedy. If there are reasons why the bill should not become a law, the President can return it to the House in which it originated with his objections, and thereupon the House can remedy the difficulty, if there is one, in the way that is laid down in the Constitution. I think the course that has been pursued during the whole history of the Government until this time is the better course in such cases. It may lead to some hardship in this particular case.

Hardships arise from all general rules, but it is better not to try a new experiment, not to set a new example in legislation, not to enter upon new and untried grounds, but to follow the established constitutional methods. The Constitution did not contemplate this remedy, and hence made no provision for it.

Mr. CANNON. The House and Senate almost daily pass resolutions, not concurrent, requesting each other to return bills. That is the request of one co-ordinate branch of the legislative power to the other to return a bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. But that is one part of the legislative branch of the Government making a request of another part of the legislative branch concerning a matter that the legislative body has yet exclusive control over.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me to complete my statement, I was going to say this: I understand that the Senate or the House, either one, might refuse to return a bill when such a resolution came from the other body.

Mr. McMILLIN. That is true.

Mr. CANNON. But in fact they do not, parliamentary practice being the other way. Now, as I understand it, the President is nothing more nor less than a third branch of Congress, and the other two co-ordinate branches may pass a concurrent resolution requesting him to return a bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. But my friend makes the error of treating the House and the Senate as two co-ordinate branches, whereas they are jointly one branch of the Government, and only one.

Mr. CANNON. I understand that they are two. The House is one, the Senate is another, and the President is the third.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then we have four co-ordinate branches of the Government instead of three. I have been accustomed to think that the House and the Senate constituted one branch, the judiciary one, and the executive the third.

Mr. CANNON. My friend is speaking of the judicial, the executive, and the legislative departments of the Government; I am speaking only of the legislative. Of the legislative there are three co-ordinate branches, the House being one, the Senate another, and the President another. Those three, concurring, legislate.

Mr. McMILLIN. I would like the gentleman from Illinois to point out anything in the Constitution which, either directly or indirectly, by express terms or by implication, provides for this method of getting rid of a bill that has gone to the President.

Mr. CANNON. From the foundation of the Government there has been this practice to a greater or less extent.

Mr. McMILLIN. But I am asking where the Constitution provides for it.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, it is a mere parliamentary practice.

Mr. McMILLIN. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the safer course is to follow the beaten path, to let the President take his course with this bill, and then, if there is anything wrong, let us remedy it during the summer that we are likely to spend here.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is not the gentleman from Tennessee aware, as a matter of fact, that from the foundation of the Government this practice has prevailed, and that more than a dozen times in the last Congress resolutions similar to this were sent to the President requesting the return of bills?

Mr. McMILLIN. I do not remember a single instance in which it has been done except by the unanimous consent of the two bodies.

Mr. DINGLEY. But unanimous consent is nothing but a suspension of the rules, and how does that distinction change the principle?

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman knows that we can do very much by unanimous consent that can not be done otherwise.

Mr. DORSEY. Yes; and if the gentleman from Tennessee does not object, we will do this by unanimous consent.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman admits that this has been done by unanimous consent, but it could not have been done even in that way if it was unconstitutional. It is certainly constitutional and in accordance with a practice which has prevailed from the foundation of the Government.

Mr. BLAND. Is this a concurrent resolution, to be passed by the Senate as well as the House?

Mr. DORSEY. It is.

Mr. KILGORE. What is the matter with this bill? How did the mistake occur?

Mr. DORSEY. The bill provides for taxing the land; and the Attorney-General has raised the question that the title of the Government to its land may be affected by allowing it to be sold for taxes.

Mr. CRISP. I presume the object is to give time for more deliberate consideration.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, I know nothing of the merits of this question. The reason why the bill ought to be returned has not been stated—

Mr. DORSEY. I did state it.

Mr. HERBERT. Or if stated I did not hear it. But inasmuch as the question has been raised, it is, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] has said, a matter of very serious concern that it be correctly decided.

Now, what will be the effect if this resolution be carried upon a motion to suspend the rules? It will be a reconsideration of a bill which the House has once already during this session considered and passed. The rule, as I understand it, according to Jefferson's Manual, is that when Parliament has once during a session considered any question it can not at the same session be reconsidered except in a mode provided by the rules.

Now, I think that ought to be and probably is the rule here. The rules of this House point out a certain manner in which the judgment of the House may be reconsidered, namely, by a motion entered at the proper time and by the proper person. Has this House the right to reconsider a question it has once passed upon at the same session, except in the particular mode pointed out by the rules? Will not this be a reconsideration? The House having already passed the bill, a motion now to suspend the rules and bring the bill back from the President can be, it seems to me, nothing else than a reconsideration by this House of its judgment. If such a precedent as this is established, what will prevent a reconsideration at any time of any question passed upon by Congress, before the President shall have acted upon it? If a question is brought up here which is closely contested and the vote be in favor of the bill and the bill be sent to the Senate, and if by subsequent changes in the House, by the coming in of new members or by the coming back of gentlemen who have been absent, the majority should happen to be the other way, would it not always be competent (if this precedent be set) for the majority, entertaining a different judgment from that which prevailed when the bill was passed, to reconsider the bill by bringing the question up on a resolution asking the President to return the bill? It seems to me that this will be the effect of the ruling, if the Chair should now overrule this point of order and say that it is competent for the House to reconsider in this manner.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not undertake to say what it is competent for the House to do. The proposition before the House is to suspend the rules and pass a concurrent resolution asking the President to return a bill. Such action has been taken on the part of both Houses of Congress so many times that it would be very singular if any one should undertake now to deny their right in this regard.

As for the constitutional considerations which are involved, that is a matter for the House to settle, and not for the Speaker. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I ask for a second on the motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. DORSEY] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE].

Mr. PAYSON. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. ROGERS. I object.

The tellers proceeded to count the House upon the question of seconding the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. DORSEY (after the count had proceeded for some time). Mr. Speaker, it appears there is no quorum present; and there is a demand for a quorum. I therefore withdraw the resolution.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PAYSON. I rise to make a privileged report from the Committee on Public Lands. I desire to report back with a substitute the Senate bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Illinois kindly withdraw his proposition until several messages from the President of the United States are laid before the House?

Mr. PAYSON. Certainly.

POSTAL AND CABLE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message of the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a letter from the Secretary of State, inclosing the recommendations of the International American Conference for the establishment of improved facilities for postal and cable communication between the United States and the several countries of Central and South America.

I can not too strongly urge upon Congress the necessity of giving this subject immediate and favorable consideration, and of making adequate appropriations to carry the recommendations into effect; and in this connection I beg leave to call attention to what was said on this subject in my annual message. The delegates of the seventeen neighboring republics, which have so recently been assembled in Washington at the invitation of this Government, have expressed their wish and purpose to co-operate with the United States in the adoption of measures to improve the means of communication between the several republics of America. They recognize the necessity of frequent, regular, and rapid steam-ship service, both for the purpose of maintaining friendly intercourse and for the convenience of commerce, and realize that without such facilities it is useless to attempt to extend the trade between their ports and ours.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS, ARIZONA AND NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In my annual message I called attention to the urgent need of legislation for the adjustment of the claims under Mexican grants to lands in Arizona and New Mexico.

I now submit a correspondence which has passed between the Department of State and the Mexican Government concerning the rights of certain Mexican citizens to have their claims to lands ceded to the United States by the treaty adjusted and confirmed. I also submit a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, with accompanying papers, showing the number and extent of these claims and their present condition. The United States owes a duty to Mexico to confirm to her citizens those valid grants that were saved by the treaty, and the long delay which has attended the discharge of this duty has given just cause for complaint.

The entire community where these large claims exist, and, indeed, all of our people, are interested in an early and final settlement of them. No greater incubus can rest upon the energies of a people or the development of a new country than that resulting from unsettled land titles. The necessity for legislation is so evident and so urgent that I venture to express the hope that relief will be given at the present session of Congress.

IOWA INDIANS, INDIAN TERRITORY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, as required by section 14 of the act of March 2, 1889, an agreement concluded on the 20th day of May last between the commissioners on behalf of the United States, commonly known as the Cherokee Commission, and the Iowa Indians residing in the Indian Territory. A letter of the Secretary of the Interior, which is accompanied by communications from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Assistant Attorney-General, is also submitted. These papers present a full and clear statement of the matters of fact and questions of law which Congress will need to consider in passing upon the question of the ratification of the agreement, which is submitted for its consideration and such action as may be deemed proper.

CELEBRATION FOURTH CENTENNIAL OF DISCOVERY OF AMERICA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following communication from the President of the United States; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Select Committee on the World's Fair, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for your information a letter from the Secretary of State inclosing a copy of the resolution passed by the International American Conference with reference to the fourth centennial of the discovery of America.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 2, 1890.

SAC AND FOX INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In compliance with the provisions of section 14 of the act of March 2, 1889, I transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress an agreement concluded between the commissioners appointed under that section on behalf of the United States, commonly known as the Cherokee Commission, and the Sac and Fox Nations of Indians in the Indian Territory, on the 12th day of June last. The Sac and Fox Nations have a national council, and the negotiation was conducted with that body, which undoubtedly had authority to contract on behalf of the tribe for the sale of these lands.

The letter of the Secretary of the Interior and the accompanying papers, which are submitted herewith, furnish all the information necessary for the consideration of the questions to be determined by Congress. The only serious question presented is as to that article of the agreement which limits the distribution of the funds to be paid by the United States under it to the Sac and Fox Nations now in the Indian Territory. I very gravely doubt whether the remnant or band of this tribe now living in Iowa has any interest in these lands in the Indian Territory. The reservation there was apparently given in consideration of improvements upon the lands of the tribe in Kansas. The band now resident in Iowa, upon lands purchased in their own name, as I am advised, left the Kansas reservation many years before the date of this treaty, and, it would seem, could have had no equitable interest in the improvements on the Kansas lands, which must have been the result of the labors of that portion of the tribe living upon them.

The right of the Iowa band to a participation of the proceeds of the sale of the Kansas reservation was exclusively reserved in the treaty; but it seems to me upon a somewhat hasty examination of the treaty that the reservation in the Indian Territory was intended only for the benefit of those who should go there to reside. The Secretary of the Interior has expressed a somewhat different view of the effect of this treaty, but if the facts are, as I understand, that the Iowa band did not contribute to the improvements, which were the consideration for the reservation, and did not accept the invitation to settle upon the reservation lands in the Indian Territory, I do not well see how they have either an equitable or a legal claim to participate in the proceeds of the sale of those lands.

The whole matter is submitted for the consideration of Congress.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following requests for leave of absence:

Mr. BREWER, for ten days.
Mr. BAENES, indefinitely.
Mr. GRISSINHAINER, indefinitely.

Mr. WILLCOX, for two weeks.

Mr. CHIPMAN, indefinitely.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia, for two weeks.

Mr. SANFORD, for this day.

Mr. ANDREW, indefinitely.

Mr. MANSUR, indefinitely.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Speaker, if these leaves are granted will it not leave the House without a quorum?

The SPEAKER. That is for the House to decide, and not for the Chair.

Mr. DUNNELL. We are very near the brink now; and the time has about come when objection should be made to the departure of any more members, excepting in cases of sickness.

Mr. PETERS. Let me remind the gentleman that the House can at any time recall these leaves of absence.

Mr. DUNNELL. I understand that; but the leaves indicate a general stampede, and if we are to have that we ought to know it.

The SPEAKER. The question is for the House to determine. Is there objection to the leaves of absence requested?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9603) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10716) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891.

The message also announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 4570) to authorize the Leavenworth and Platte County Bridge Company to substitute a pivot draw-bridge over the Missouri River in place of the ponton bridge, disagreed to by the House; agreed to the conference asked by the House, and had appointed Mr. VEST, Mr. CULLOM, and Mr. DOLPH as conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which concurrence was requested:

A bill (S. 3788) to amend the laws relative to shipping commissioners; and

A bill (S. 3831) to provide for the delivery of land patents to their rightful owners, and for other purposes.

FORFEITURE OF RAILROAD LAND GRANTS.

Mr. PAYSON. I ask for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2781) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby forfeited to the United States, and the United States hereby resumes the title thereto, all lands heretofore granted to any State or to any corporation to aid in the construction of a railroad opposite to and continuous with the portion of any such railroad not now completed and in operation, for the construction or benefit of which lands have heretofore been granted; and all such lands are declared to be a part of the public domain: Provided, That this act shall not be construed as forfeiting the right of way or depot grounds of any railroad company heretofore granted, or as forfeiting any lands heretofore earned by the construction of any portion of a railroad under any act of Congress making a grant of public lands.

Sec. 2. That in all cases where persons are in possession of any of the lands affected by any such grant and hereby resumed by and restored to the United States, under deed, written contract with, or license from, the State or corporation to which such grant was made, or its assignee, executed prior to January 1, 1888, they shall be entitled to purchase the same from the United States, in quantities not exceeding 320 acres to any one such person, at the rate of $1.25 per acre, at any time within two years from the passage of this act, and on making said payment to receive patents therefor: Provided, That in all cases where parties, persons, or corporations, with the permission of such State or corporation, or its assignee, are in the possession of and have made improvements upon any of the lands hereby resumed and restored, and are not entitled to enter the same under the provisions of this act, such parties, persons, or corporations shall have six months in which to remove any growing crop, and within which time they shall also be entitled to remove all buildings and other movable improvements from said lands: Provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to any lands situate in the State of Iowa, on which any person in good faith has made or asserted the right to make a pre-emption or homestead settlement: And provided further, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed as limiting the rights granted to purchasers or settlers by "An act to provide for the adjustment of land grants made by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads and for the forfeiture of unearned lands, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1887, or as repealing, altering, or amending said act, nor as in any manner affecting any cause of action existing in favor of any purchaser against his grantor for breach of any covenants of title.

Sec. 3. That if it shall be found that any lands heretofore granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company and so resumed by the United States and restored to the public domain lie north of the line known as the "Harrison line," being a line drawn from Wallula, Wash., easterly to the southeast corner of the northeast one-fourth of the southeast quarter of section 27, in township 7 north, of range 37 east of the Willamette meridian, all persons who had acquired in good faith the title of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to any portion of said lands prior to July 1, 1885, or who at said date were in possession of any portion of said lands or had improved the same, claiming the same under written contract with said company, executed in good faith, or their heirs or assigns, as the case may be, shall be entitled to purchase the land so acquired, possessed, or improved, from the United States, at any time prior to the expiration of one year after it shall be finally determined that such lands are restored to the public domain by the provisions of this act, at the rate of $2.50 per acre, and to receive patents therefor upon proof before the proper land office of the fact of such acquisition, possession, or improvement, and payment therefor, without limitation as to quantity: Provided, That the rights of way and riparian rights heretofore attempted to be conveyed to the city of Portland, in the State of Oregon, by the Northern Pacific Railroad Company and the Central Trust Company, of New York, by deed of conveyance dated August 8, 1886, and which are described as follows: A strip of land 50 feet in width, being 25 feet on each side of the center line of a water-pipe line, as the same is staked out and located, or as it shall be hereafter finally located according to the provisions of an act of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, approved November 25, 1885, providing for the means to supply the city of Portland with an abundance of good, pure, and wholesome water over and across the following described tracts of land: Sections 19 and 31, in township 1 south, of range 6 east; sections 25, 31, 33, and 35, in township 1 south, of range 5 east; sections 3 and 5, in township 2 south, of range 5 east; section 1, in township 2 south, of range 4 east; sections 23, 25, and 35, in township 1 south, of range 4 east of the Willamette meridian, in the State of Oregon, forfeited by this act are hereby confirmed unto the said city of Portland, in the State of Oregon, its successors and assigns forever, with the right to enter on the hereinbefore described strip of land, over and across the above described sections for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, and repairing a water-pipe line as aforesaid.

SEC. 4. That section 5 of an act entitled "An act for a grant of lands to the State of Iowa in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State," approved May 17, 1864, and section 7 of an act entitled "An act extending the time for the completion of certain land-grant railroads in the States of Minnesota and Iowa, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1865, and also section 5 of an act entitled "An act making an additional grant of lands to the State of Minnesota in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of railroads in said State," approved July 4, 1866, so far as said sections are applicable to lands embraced within the indemnity limits of said sections, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and so much of the provisions of section 4 of an act approved June 2, 1864, and entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act making a grant of lands to the State of Iowa in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State,'" approved May 15, 1866, be, and the same are hereby, repealed, so far as they require the Secretary of the Interior to reserve any lands but the odd sections within the primary of 6 miles granted limits of the roads mentioned in said act of June 2, 1864, or the act to which the same is amendatory.

SEC. 5. That no lands declared forfeited to the United States by this act shall by reason of such forfeiture inure to the benefit of any State or corporation to which lands may have been granted by Congress, except as herein otherwise provided; nor shall this act be construed to enlarge the area of land originally covered by any such grant, or to confer any right upon any State, corporation, or person to lands which were excepted from such grant. Nor shall the moiety of the lands granted to any railroad company on account of a main and a branch line appertaining to uncompleted road, and hereby forfeited, within the conflicting limits of the grants for such main and branch lines, when but one of such lines has been completed, inure, by virtue of the forfeiture hereby declared, to the benefit of the completed line.

SEC. 6. That all persons who may have settled upon and are now in possession of any of the lands hereby forfeited, and who may desire to enter the same under the homestead law, shall be allowed, when making final proof, for the time they have already resided upon and cultivated the same.

SEC. 7. That the provisions of this act shall not extend to any railroad in Alabama which is completed through its entire length, as prescribed in its charter, within one year after the date of the approval of this act. And as to any railroad in said State not so completed this act shall take effect and operate from the date of its approval.

SEC. 8. That in all cases where lands included in a grant of land to the State of Mississippi, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad from Brandon to the Gulf of Mexico, commonly known as the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad, have heretofore been sold by the officers of the United States for cash, or with the allowance or approval of such officers have been entered in good faith under the pre-emption or homestead laws, the right and title of the persons holding or claiming any such lands under such sales or entries are hereby confirmed. And on condition that the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad Company within sixty days from the passage of this act shall, by resolution of its board of directors, duly accept the provisions of the same and file with the Secretary of the Interior a valid relinquishment of all said company's interest, right, title, and claim in and to all such lands as have been sold or entered as aforesaid, then the forfeiture declared in the first section of this act shall not apply to or in any wise affect so much and such parts of said grant of lands to the State of Mississippi as lie south of a line drawn east and west through the point where the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad may cross the New Orleans and Northeastern Railroad in said State, until one year after the passage of this act.

SEC. 9. That where any such lands granted to the State of Alabama to aid in the construction of a railroad from Montgomery in said State to the boundary line between Florida and Alabama have been sold and conveyed as the property of any railroad company for State and county taxes thereon, and the grant of such company has been or shall be hereafter forfeited, the purchaser thereof for such taxes shall have the prior right to purchase such lands from the United States at $2.50 per acre, and patents for such land shall thereupon issue, which right shall continue for one year from the approval of this act and no longer; or for one year from declaration of the forfeiture; if said declaration shall be subsequent to the approval of this act: Provided, That said lands were not previous to or at the time of the taking effect of this act in the possession of or subject to the right of any actual settler.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I make the point of order that this bill should be considered in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PAYSON. Before we reach that I will state that the House Committee on Public Lands recommend a substitute for the bill, striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting a substitute, which has not been read by the Clerk. I desire that the Clerk may read the substitute.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] anything to say in reply to the point of order made by the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. PAYSON. As soon as the bill has been read I will reply to that.

The SPEAKER. The substitute will be read.
The Clerk read as follows:

That there is hereby forfeited to the United States, and the United States hereby resumes the title thereto, all lands heretofore granted to any State or to any corporation to aid in the construction of a railroad opposite to and continuous with the portion of any such railroad not now completed, for the construction or benefit of which lands have heretofore been granted; and all such lands are declared to be a part of the public domain: Provided, That this act shall not be construed as forfeiting the right of way or depot grounds of any railroad company heretofore granted, or lands included in any city, town, or village site.

SEC. 2. That all persons who, at the date of the passage of this act, are actual settlers in good faith on any of the lands hereby forfeited and are otherwise qualified, on making due claim on said lands under the homestead law within six months after the passage of this act, shall be entitled to a preference right to enter the same under the provisions of the homestead law and this act, and shall be regarded as such actual settlers from the date of actual settlement or occupation; and any person who has not heretofore had the benefit of the homestead or pre-emption law, or who has failed from any cause to perfect the title to a tract of land heretofore entered by him under either of said laws, may make a second homestead entry under the provisions of this act. The Secretary of the Interior will make such rules as will secure to such actual settlers these rights.

SEC. 3. That in all cases where persons are in possession of any of the lands affected by any such grant and hereby resumed by and restored to the United States, under deed, written contract with, or license from, the State or corporation to which such grant was made, or its assignees, executed prior to January 1, 1888, they shall be entitled to purchase the same from the United States, in quantities not exceeding 320 acres to any one such person, at the rate of $1.25 per acre, at any time within two years from the passage of this act, and on making said payment to receive patents therefor: Provided, That in all cases where parties, persons, or corporations, with the permission of such State or corporation, or its assignees, are in the possession of and have made improvements upon any of the lands hereby resumed and restored, and are not entitled to enter the same under the provisions of this act, such parties, persons, or corporations shall have six months in which to remove any growing crop, and within which time they shall also be entitled to remove all buildings and other movable improvements from said lands: Provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to any lands situate in the State of Iowa on which any person in good faith has made or asserted the right to make a pre-emption or homestead settlement: And provided further, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed as limiting the rights granted to purchasers or settlers by "An act to provide for the adjustment of land grants made by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads and for the forfeiture of unearned lands, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1887, or as repealing, altering, or amending said act, nor as in any manner affecting any cause of action existing in favor of any purchaser against his grantor for breach of any covenants of title.

SEC. 4. That section 5 of an act entitled "An act for a grant of lands to the State of Iowa in alternate sections to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State," approved May 17, 1864, and section 7 of an act entitled "An act extending the time for the completion of certain land-grant railroads in the States of Minnesota and Iowa, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1865, and also section 5 of an act entitled "An act making an additional grant of lands to the State of Minnesota in alternate sections to aid in the construction of railroads in said State," approved July 4, 1866, so far as said sections are applicable to lands embraced within the indemnity limits of said sections, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and so much of the provisions of section 4 of an act approved June 2, 1864, and entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act making a grant of lands to the State of Iowa in alternate sections to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State,'" approved May 15, 1866, be, and the same are hereby, repealed so far as they require the Secretary of the Interior to reserve any lands but the odd sections within the primary or 6 miles granted limits of the roads mentioned in said act of June 2, 1864, or the act to which the same is amendatory.

SEC. 5. That if it shall be found that any lands heretofore granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company and so resumed by the United States and restored to the public domain lie north of the line known as the "Harrison line," being a line drawn from Wallula, Wash., easterly to the southeast corner of the northeast one-fourth of the southeast quarter of section 27, in township 7 north, of range 37 east of the Willamette meridian, all persons who had acquired in good faith the title of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to any portion of said lands prior to July 1, 1885, or who at said date were in possession of any portion of said lands or had improved the same, claiming the same under written contract with said company, executed in good faith, or their heirs or assigns, as the case may be, shall be entitled to purchase the lands so acquired, possessed, or improved, from the United States, at any time prior to the expiration of one year after it shall be finally determined that such lands are restored to the public domain by the provisions of this act, at the rate of $2.50 per acre, and to receive patents therefor upon proof before the proper land office of the fact of such acquisition, possession, or improvement, and payment therefor, without limitation as to quantity: Provided, That the rights of way and riparian rights heretofore attempted to be conveyed to the city of Portland, in the State of Oregon, by the Northern Pacific Railroad Company and the Central Trust Company of New York, by deed of conveyance dated August 8, 1886, and which are described as follows: A strip of land 50 feet in width, being 25 feet on each side of the center line of a water-pipe line, as the same is staked out and located, or as it shall be hereafter finally located according to the provisions of an act of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon approved November 25, 1885, providing for the means to supply the city of Portland with an abundance of good, pure, and wholesome water over and across the following described tracts of land: Sections 19 and 31, in township 1 south, of range 6 east; sections 25, 31, 33, and 35, in township 1 south, of range 5 east; sections 3 and 5, in township 2 south, of range 5 east; section 1, in township 2 south, of range 4 east; sections 23, 25, and 35, in township 1 south, of range 4 east of the Willamette meridian, in the State of Oregon, forfeited by this act, are hereby confirmed unto the said city of Portland, in the State of Oregon, its successors and assigns forever, with the right to enter on the hereinbefore described strip of land, over and across the above described sections, for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, and repairing a water-pipe line as aforesaid.

SEC. 6. That no lands declared forfeited to the United States by this act shall by reason of such forfeiture inure to the benefit of any State or corporation to which lands may have been granted by Congress, except as herein otherwise provided; nor shall this act be construed to enlarge the area of land originally covered by any such grant, or to confer any right upon any State, corporation, or person to lands which were excepted from such grant. Nor shall the moiety of the lands granted to any railroad company on account of a main and a branch line appertaining to uncompleted road, and hereby forfeited, within the conflicting limits of the grants for such main and branch lines, when but one of such lines has been completed, inure, by virtue of the forfeiture hereby declared, to the benefit of the completed line, and the price of all lands affected hereby and hereby restored, when in any way sold, is hereby reduced to $1.25 per acre.

SEC. 7. That nothing in this act shall be construed to waive or release in any way any right of the United States to have any other lands granted by them, as recited in the first section, forfeited for any failure, past or future, to comply with the conditions of the grant.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that this bill should be considered in Committee of the Whole, and I believe it is agreed by the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands that that is the proper course it should take.

Mr. PAYSON. No, I do not agree to that, but I desire to state, if the gentleman will permit an interruption here, that there is no disposition on the part of myself or any friend of the bill to interfere in the least with the right of debate or the right to offer such amendments as gentlemen may choose to offer to the bill. I say this without conceding that there is anything in the point of order raised by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. If the point of order be sustained it is only a matter of form in any event. I do not think there is anything in the bill that makes it subject to the point of order at all. I assure the gentleman from Missouri that there is no desire to stifle debate or prevent an opportunity for offering any amendments that may be desired to be offered, and I suggest that we go on in the regular way in the consideration of the bill.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that the point of order ought to be made. I make the point out of deference to the suggestion of a number of gentlemen that it would be best to consider it in Committee of the Whole.

As to whether this bill is subject to this point of order, I desire to say to the Chair that this bill provides for the forfeiture of quite a large amount of lands granted heretofore to railroad companies to aid in their construction. There are other provisions in the bill to the effect that any part of this land which has been conveyed or attempted to be conveyed by the railroad to its grantees since the date of the grant, and which are now in the hands or in the possession of grantees of the railroad companies, or persons who are in the possession of lands under claim of ownership under the public-land laws of the United States—there are provisions in the bill confirming the titles of such persons to certain portions of those lands, namely, to the extent of 320 acres to each person. Now, I take it, sir, that if these lands are subject to forfeiture at all, and are forfeited, that the title becomes absolute in the Government of the United States, and that any further provision in the bill which seeks to part with the title to them by confirming the title or by grant is such a disposition of the property of the United States as makes the bill come within the meaning and intent of the rule.

The SPEAKER. The acts are simultaneous, are they not? If such action takes place it is simultaneous, is it not?

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Oh, yes.

The SPEAKER. That is, the United States reacquires the title, and at the same instant the title passes to these persons mentioned.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. It is all in the same bill.

Mr. HERMANN. If the gentleman will permit me, I think he is somewhat in error as to the provisions of the bill. The bill recognizes the title as being in the United States, but permits these persons in possession to make purchase from the Government at the rate of $2.50 an acre.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be heard at the convenience of the Chair on that point of order.

Mr. PAYSON. I desire to state in connection with what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] has just said, that section 3 of the bill is the section as to which the point of order is made. It provides:

SEC. 3. That in all cases where persons are in possession of any of the lands affected by any such grant and hereby resumed by and restored to the United States, under deed, written contract with, or license from, the State or corporation to which such grant was made, or its assignees, executed prior to January 1, 1887, they shall be entitled to purchase the same from the United States, in quantities not exceeding 320 acres to any one such person, at the rate of $1.25 per acre, at any time within two years from the passage of this act, and on making said payment to receive patents therefor.

It provides that persons in possession shall have the prior right of purchase at the price which other persons would have to pay for Government land. And this section, to which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] addresses his point of order, is not a disposition of the property, nor an appropriation of the property; but simply gives a prior right of purchase to land in possession of these persons at the price that is fixed by statute law. That is all there is of it. The language of the rule, Mr. Speaker, is as follows. Clause 3 of Rule XXIII provides:

All motions or propositions involving a tax or charge upon the people; all proceedings touching appropriations of money, or bills making appropriations of money—

It does not come within that. The rule further provides:

or property, or requiring such appropriation to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, or releasing any liability to the United States for money or property, shall be first considered in a Committee of the Whole.

There is no appropriation of property. There is no disposition of property, and no change in existing law except that the prior right of purchase is given to the man who for the time being happens to be in possession.

The SPEAKER. And that is to be the same price?

Mr. PAYSON. And that is to be the same price that any citizen would pay.

The SPEAKER. And no difference whatever from the manner that any other citizen would pay?

Mr. PAYSON. None whatever.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Is there not a provision in the bill for confirming the titles of purchasers from the railroad company of tracts of 320 acres?

Mr. PAYSON. What it requires is a purchase from the Government at the regular Government price. There is no confirmation of the title as granted by the company; none whatever. There was a bill pending in the last Congress which proposed to do that; but this bill does not propose to do so. Mr. Speaker, I had better read it all, though it is a long section:

SEC. 2. That in all cases where persons are in possession of any of the lands affected by any such grant and hereby resumed by and restored to the United States, under deed, written contract with, or license from, the State or corporation to which such grant was made, or its assignees, executed prior to January 1, 1887, they shall be entitled to purchase the same from the United States, in quantities not exceeding 320 acres to any one such person, at the rate of $1.25 per acre, at any time within two years from the passage of this act, and on making said payment to receive patents therefor: Provided, That in all cases where parties, persons, or corporations, with the permission of such State or corporation, or its assignees, are in possession of and have made improvements upon any of the lands hereby resumed and restored, and are not entitled to enter the same under the provisions of this act, such parties, persons, or corporations shall have six months in which to remove any growing crop, and within which time they shall also be entitled to remove all buildings and other movable improvements from said lands: Provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to any lands situate in the State of Iowa, on which any person in good faith has made or asserted the right to make a pre-emption or homestead settlement: And provided further, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed as limiting the rights granted to purchasers or settlers by "An act to provide for the adjustment of land grants made by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads and for the forfeiture of unearned lands, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1887, or as repealing, altering, or amending said act, nor as in any manner affecting any cause of action existing in favor of any purchaser against his grantor for breach of any covenants of title.

There is no confirmation of title in anybody, nor is it seeking to deprive any one of possession; but those original parties and any one who is in possession or under a contract with the railroad on lands the title to which was forfeitable are to be given the preference right of paying for it.

The SPEAKER. Just the same as any citizen could be given that privilege?

Mr. PAYSON. Any citizen could do precisely the same thing.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I would like to suggest to the Chair that this whole question turns upon the fact whether the land which is here spoken of as forfeited, or the land to be forfeited, belongs to the Government of the United States or belongs to the railroad companies. If it belongs to the railroad company, Congress can not forfeit it. If it is forfeitable, then it now belongs to the Government; so that it is clearly and distinctly a part of the public domain.

There certainly are sections of land covered by the provisions of this bill entirely outside of the 20-mile limit which the railroads claim. Now, take a section lying entirely without the limit of the grant—land, in other words, which the company has gotten under some pretense, but to which it has no title whatever and can not have any title; land that never was and never could be within its lands—

Mr. PAYSON. Let me understand—

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Not now. I can not yield.

Take that section of land. There can be no fog about that. There can be no subtle legal allegations as to the fact that that section of land is public domain precisely as much as if the land were not within a thousand miles of a railroad, if there could be such lands. I think that section would be covered by this bill, and the point of order raised by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] would apply to that section. The Chair would clearly hold, I fancy, that, as to such a section of land as that, it was undoubtedly the property of the United States, and therefore I think it would be covered by that clause of the rule which the gentleman from Illinois has just cited, under which clause the bill would necessarily have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. But, even in that event, is there any difference from the present law, except that persons who have settled there under color of title or under claim of title would have the preference?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Yes, sir; I am coming to that. The point I wish now to impress is this: That there may be in the Treasury $100,000 appropriated, say, to A B, but here is another $100,000 or $10,000 lying in the Treasury for which no appropriation act was ever passed, but which A B claims. Now, I take that to be precisely an analogous case to this. Certainly that $10,000 is the property of the United States, and any bill or proposition to appropriate it would be considered in Committee of the Whole under the rule.

The SPEAKER. But is it any more appropriated by this bill than it is now?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. It is not appropriated at all and never was. That is my point.

The SPEAKER. It is appropriated for the use of those who purchase it under the law, is it not?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Not at all. I am speaking of a point back of that which the Chair is considering. I am at the first point in the whole proposition, namely, that if the land ever was appropriated, so to speak, or granted, to a railway company, then the United States can not forfeit it except upon a breach of conditions of the grant; and I am calling the attention of the Chair to cases where land has been claimed by railroad companies entirely outside of the possible limits of their grants, land to which they could have no possible claim and as to which the Government never gave any title whatever or made any provision whatever, and that there are such lands covered by this bill I have no doubt.

Mr. PAYSON. Will the gentleman from Kansas permit me—

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Not now, please. I want to call the attention of the Chair to the provisions of the bill. In the second section it provides that all persons who at the date of the passage of this act are actual settlers in good faith on any of the lands hereby forfeited may make settlement, and so on. Now, if the land is forfeited, by that act it becomes the property of the United States, and any man may homestead it just as he may now homestead lands in the United States. I can see no difference whatever between that land after it has clearly been passed to the public domain, as it is by this act, and any other section of public land as to which a homesteader may now file his claim. If the proposition before the Chair were this: Whether we should pass a law permitting a man to homestead public lands, that clearly would be a bill parting with property of the United States, and I fancy that under the rule it would have to receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Now, my point is that it makes no difference whether a particular tract is held by a railroad company or not—and I am now speaking of a second class of lands distinct from that of which I have spoken heretofore—the very moment it is forfeited, the very moment it has passed to the public domain—both of which acts, though simultaneous, must be done before the homesteader can acquire any right in the lands—my point is that at the very moment when that land is made a part of the public domain it could not be parted with except under the homestead law, and therefore, being public property, a bill to part with it must be considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Does not the law already provide for parting with that property upon the same terms as those prescribed in this bill?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. No, I think not.

The SPEAKER. The point the Chair wants to get at is this: Does this bill, with regard to any land, whether it was forfeited or whether it never belonged to a railroad company at all, and consequently was always part of the public domain, but, nevertheless, was in dispute—does this bill, with regard to any such land, make any other difference than this, that it gives a preference to individuals to purchase the land at the same price and under the same regulations provided for by existing law, that preference being given on account of the complications which have arisen out of the dispute?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I may not be quite accurate in the statement I am about to make, though I think I am. I think that in the latter part of the bill a provision is made as to the homesteader which does not exist in the present law, namely, that "any person who has not heretofore had the benefit of the homestead or pre-emption law, or who has failed from any cause to perfect the title to a tract of land heretofore entered by him under either of said laws, may make a second homestead entry under the provisions of this act." The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] can say whether I am correct as to that or not.

Mr. PAYSON. There is a change made in the existing law simply as to the qualification of the homesteader. As the law stands to-day, a man can only take one homestead claim; making a homestead claim and disposing of it prevents his acquiring another homestead right; that is, he exhausts the homestead privilege which the existing law gives him. This bill provides that if he has exhausted his homestead right he may, under this act, exercise it again. That is all. There is no change with reference to the quantity of land he may take and no attempt to regulate the disposition of the property under existing law, but there is simply a change made in the qualification of the homesteader by providing that if he has exhausted his homestead right under existing law he may exercise it again.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Well, the Chair will perceive that when you undertake to provide different conditions under which a homesteader may acquire public land, the bill which does that is one which ought to be considered in Committee of the Whole.

Now, I wish to call the attention of the Chair to one more point.

The SPEAKER. Is it a fact that this bill provides that a citizen of the United States may twice exercise his homestead rights?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Yes, sir; and that is a change of existing law.

Mr. HERMANN. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon. The bill provides that if, in the first instance, the man has failed to perfect his title, then he may make a second homestead entry. The original entry does not necessarily imply the perfection of title, but only an attempt to perfect it; and this bill provides that if a man has failed to perfect his title he may make a second entry under this act.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. My impression is to the effect that under the existing law, when a man has once attempted to make a homestead entry, whether he perfects his title or not, that rules him out from a second attempt.

Mr. PAYSON. Oh, no.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Well, then I withdraw that statement.

Now, I wish to call the attention of the Chair to another point. On page 12 of the printed bill, section 5, it is provided—

That if it shall be found that any lands heretofore granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company and so resumed by the United States and restored to the public domain lie north of the line known as the "Harrison line," being a line drawn from Wallula, Wash., easterly to the southeast corner of the northeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 27, in township 7 north, of range 37 east of the Willamette meridian, all persons who had acquired in good faith the title of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to any portion of said lands prior to July 1, 1885, or who at said date were in possession of any portion of said lands or had improved the same, claiming the same under written contract with said company, executed in good faith, or their heirs or assigns, as the case may be, shall be entitled to purchase the lands so acquired, possessed, or improved, from the United States, at any time prior to the expiration of one year after it shall be finally determined that such lands are restored to the public domain by the provisions of this act, at the rate of $2.50 per acre, and to receive patents therefor upon proof before the proper land office of the fact of such acquisition, possession, or improvement, and payment therefor, without limitation as to quantity.

Now there is a case where the land, being north of this "Harrison line," is by the bill clearly and distinctly declared to be United States property, which the party may purchase. Then there is a provision somewhere else—I can not now find it—which permits the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to purchase not exceeding 320 acres of land for depot or station purposes, etc., is there not?

Mr. PAYSON. Oh, no; there is no such provision in this bill.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I supposed there was a provision of that kind.

Mr. PAYSON. None whatever. You are thinking of a bill of the last Congress. There is nothing of that kind in this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the third section of the original bill (and the provision is the same in the substitute) in regard to this grant to the city of Portland, Oregon. I believe that has not been brought to the attention of the Chair. Section 3 of the original bill provides—

That the rights of way and riparian rights heretofore attempted to be conveyed to the city of Portland, in the State of Oregon, by the Northern Pacific Railroad Company and the Central Trust Company of New York, by deed of conveyance dated August 8, 1886, and which are described as follows—

Then follows a description of the several pieces of land—

are hereby confirmed unto the said city of Portland, in the State of Oregon, its successors and assigns forever, with the right to enter on the heretofore-described strip of land, over and across the above-described sections, for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, and repairing a water-pipe line as aforesaid.

Now this language is a clear confirmation of grants heretofore made and which the bill assumes had no authority whatever, as they were within the limits of lands through which the railroad has never yet been constructed. This is a virtual grant of a strip of land 50 feet wide—

The SPEAKER. To what section of the bill does the gentleman refer?

Mr. HOLMAN. Section 3 of the original bill. I believe the language is the same in the substitute.

Mr. PAYSON. It is section 5 of the substitute.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is certainly a very clear and distinct grant of public property. It confirms a grant of these lands which the bill itself assumes was absolutely void.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] to the language of this section, which seems to confirm a title—

Mr. PAYSON. That is a point that has not heretofore been made, but upon looking at the language I am not so clear in my own mind but that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is right.

Mr. HOLMAN. The point of order as made applies of course to the entire bill.

The SPEAKER. When this point of order is made every portion of the bill is to be considered. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. PAYSON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering Senate bill No. 2781. The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. PETERS in the chair) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (S. 2781) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes.

Mr. PAYSON. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. HOOKER. Before that question is put, I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Illinois whether the printed bill furnished us—Senate bill 2781—is the bill now under consideration.

Mr. PAYSON. I do not know what print the gentleman has; but Senate bill 2781 as amended by the committee, the amendment being in the form of a substitute, which is printed in italics, is the measure now before us for consideration.

Mr. HOOKER. I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois is that we adopt a substitute proposed by the House Committee on Public Lands.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first or formal reading of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to dispensing with the reading of the Senate bill, but I hope the gentleman from Illinois will permit the substitute to be read again, so that it may be distinctly understood.

Mr. PAYSON. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] calls for the reading of the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"Be it enacted, etc., That there are hereby forfeited to the United States, and the United States hereby resumes the title thereto, all lands heretofore granted to any State or to any corporation to aid in the construction of a railroad opposite to and contiguous with the portion of any such railroad not now completed, for the construction or benefit of which lands have heretofore been granted; and all such lands are declared to be a part of the public domain: Provided, That this act shall not be construed as forfeiting the right of way or depot grounds of any railroad company heretofore granted, or lands included in any city, town, or village site.

"SEC. 2. That all persons who, at the date of the passage of this act, are actual settlers in good faith on any of the lands hereby forfeited and are otherwise qualified, on making due claim on said lands under the homestead law within six months after the passage of this act, shall be entitled to a preference right to enter the same under the provision of the homestead law and this act, and shall be regarded as such actual settlers from the date of actual settlement or occupation; and any person who has not heretofore had the benefit of the homestead or pre-emption law, or who has failed from any cause to perfect the title to a tract of land heretofore entered by him under either of said laws, may make a second homestead entry under the provisions of this act. The Secretary of the Interior will make such rules as will secure to such actual settlers these rights.

"SEC. 3. That in all cases where persons are in possession of any of the lands affected by any such grant and hereby resumed by and restored to the United States, under deed, written contract with, or license from the State or corporation to which such grant was made, or its assignees, executed prior to January 1, 1888, they shall be entitled to purchase the same from the United States, in quantities not exceeding 320 acres to any one such person, at the rate of $1.25 per acre, at any time within two years from the passage of this act, and on making said payment to receive patents therefor: Provided, That in all cases where parties, persons, or corporations, with the permission of such State or corporation, or its assignees, are in the possession of and have made improvements upon any of the lands hereby resumed and restored, and are not entitled to enter the same under the provisions of this act, such parties, persons, or corporations shall have six months in which to remove any growing crop, and within which time they shall also be entitled to move all buildings and other movable improvements from said lands: Provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to any lands (situate in the State of Iowa) on which any person in good faith has made, or asserted the right to make, a pre-emption or homestead settlement: And provided further, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed as limiting the rights granted to purchasers or settlers by "An act to provide for the adjustment of land grants made by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads and for the forfeiture of unearned lands, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1887, or as repealing, altering, or amending said act, nor as in any manner affecting any cause of action existing in favor of any purchaser against his grantor for breach of any covenants of title.

"SEC. 4. That section 5 of an act entitled 'An act for a grant of lands to the State of Iowa in alternate sections to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State,' approved May 17, 1864, and section 7 of an act entitled 'An act extending the time for the completion of certain land-grant railroads in the States of Minnesota and Iowa, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1865, and also section 5 of an act entitled 'An act making an additional grant of lands to the State of Minnesota in alternate sections to aid in the construction of railroads in said State,' approved July 4, 1866, so far as said sections are applicable to lands embraced within the indemnity limits of said grants, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and so much of the provisions of section 4 of an act approved June 2, 1864, and entitled 'An act to amend an act entitled "An act making a grant of lands to the State of Iowa in alternate sections to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State," approved May 15, 1866,' be, and the same are hereby, repealed so far as they require the Secretary of the Interior to reserve any lands but the odd sections within the primary or 6 miles granted limits of the roads mentioned in said act of June 2, 1864, or the act to which the same is amendatory.

"SEC. 5. That if it shall be found that any lands heretofore granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company and so resumed by the United States and restored to the public domain lie north of the line known as the "Harrison line," being a line drawn from Wallula, Wash., easterly to the southeast corner of the northeast one-fourth of the southeast quarter of section 27, in township 7 north, of range 37 east of the Willamette meridian, all persons who had acquired in good faith the title of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to any portion of said lands prior to July 1, 1885, or who at said date were in possession of any portion of said lands or had improved the same, claiming the same under written contract with said company, executed in good faith, or their heirs or assigns, as the case may be, shall be entitled to purchase the lands so acquired, possessed, or improved from the United States, at any time prior to the expiration of one year after it shall be finally determined that such lands are restored to the public domain by the provisions of this act, at the rate of $2.50 per acre, and to receive patents therefor upon proof before the proper land office of the fact of such acquisition, possession, or improvement, and payment therefor, without limitation as to quantity: Provided, That the rights of way and riparian rights heretofore attempted to be conveyed to the city of Portland, in the State of Oregon, by the Northern Pacific Railroad Company and the Central Trust Company of New York, by deed of conveyance dated August 8, 1883, and which are described as follows: A strip of land 50 feet in width, being 25 feet on each side of the center line of a water-pipe line, as the same is staked out and located, or as it shall be hereafter finally located according to the provisions of an act of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon approved November 25, 1885, providing for the means to supply the city of Portland with an abundance of good, pure, and wholesome water over and across the following-described tracts of land: Sections 19 and 31, in township 1 south, of range 6 east; sections 25, 31, 33, and 35, in township 1 south, of range 5 east; sections 3 and 5, in township 2 south, of range 5 east; section 1, in township 2 south, of range 4 east; sections 23, 25, and 35, in township 1 south, of range 4 east of the Willamette meridian, in the State of Oregon, forfeited by this act, are hereby confirmed unto the said city of Portland, in the State of Oregon, its successors and assigns forever, with the right to enter on the hereinbefore-described strip of land, over and across the above-described sections for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, and repairing a water-pipe line as aforesaid.

"SEC. 6. That no lands declared forfeited to the United States by this act shall by reason of such forfeiture inure to the benefit of any State or corporation to which lands may have been granted by Congress, except as herein otherwise provided; nor shall this act be construed to enlarge the area of land originally covered by any such grant or to confer any right upon any State, corporation, or person to lands which were excepted from such grant. Nor shall the moiety of the lands granted to any railroad company on account of a main and a branch line appertaining to uncompleted road and hereby forfeited, within the conflicting limits of the grants for such main and branch lines, when but one of such lines has been completed, inure, by virtue of the forfeiture hereby declared, to the benefit of the completed line; and the price of all lands affected hereby and hereby restored when in any way sold is hereby reduced to $1.25 per acre.

"SEC. 7. That nothing in this act shall be construed to waive or release in any way any right of the United States to have any other lands granted by them, as recited in the first section, forfeited for any failure, past or future, to comply with the conditions of the grant."

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Chairman, so far as I am advised, I do not know of any opposition on the part of any member of the House—unless possibly it may be my friend from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON]—to the adoption of the amendment which has just been read to the Senate bill.

Mr. DUNNELL. Will not the gentleman from Illinois state to the Committee of the Whole the difference between the Senate bill and the House proposition?

Mr. PAYSON. I was about to do that. At the outset, when interrupted by the gentleman from Minnesota, I said that I did not know of any objection on the part of any member of the House to the adoption of the substitute proposed by the committee as an amendment to the Senate bill, unless it might possibly come from the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON], and I do not know how far his opposition may extend when he comes to understand the proposition submitted.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. PAYSON. Certainly.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. The bill is so long that I am frank to say I do not know what it undertakes to enact.

Mr. PAYSON. Then I will address myself as well to my friend from Kansas as to the other members of the committee, feeling sure that he will be included in the class which I have named when he has heard a statement of what the bill does undertake to do.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. If this bill undertakes to grant land to these railroad companies to which they are not now entitled or seeks to confirm grants which they have not earned, I am opposed to it.

Mr. PAYSON. Well, the bill does exactly the reverse, as the gentleman will understand after he has heard an explanation of the bill.

This bill, Mr. Chairman, in its general provisions proposes to forfeit and restore to the public domain all of the public lands, wherever situated in the Union, which have been heretofore granted in aid of the construction of railroads in the United States, which roads have not been completed within the time specified in the granting acts. The first section of the amended bill presented by the committee in terms provides for doing that.

This subject is by no means a new one in the House of Representatives, and the principle which is involved in the first section of the committee's amendment has received approval in the House of Representatives in the last three or four Congresses and in the Senate of the United States as well, and only failed to become a law because of other provisions which were attached to it and in reference to which there was disagreement between the Senate and the House as to the policy which should be adopted with reference to them.

Continuing a single word further in that same line, let me say that while the old members of Congress are doubtless familiar with all of the details of this legislation, there are new members, many gentlemen sitting about me now, who, perhaps, have not had occasion to investigate the matter fully or to acquire as accurate a knowledge as to the situation as others upon the floor, and so briefly I shall ask the attention of the committee while I make a résumé of the situation calling for this legislation.

Many years ago, Mr. Chairman, commencing prominently in 1856, the policy obtained in Congress of making grants of the public land in aid of public improvements throughout the States, such as railroads, wagon-roads, and canals. The policy was adopted in Congress in aid of such enterprises here and there throughout the Union of granting public lands, usually in alternate sections and usually of the width of 6 miles on either side of the proposed railroad, which grants were made to the different States of the Union for this purpose, or occasionally directly to the corporation itself. The State was made the trustee for the company which undertook the construction of the road, and, as it should progress, usually in sections of 20 miles, so that as 20 miles of the railroad, wagon-road, or canal, as the case might be, was constructed, the line for that distance should be examined by the inspectors on the part of the Government, and if found to be in accordance with the law the land was either to be sold for the benefit of the corporation carrying on the work or was patented to the corporation, to be disposed of according to its own judgment.

In all of these acts of Congress making provision for such donations of the public land a time was always fixed in which the work should be completed, usually ten years, sometimes only six years, and occasionally longer, some being as high as twenty years, but usually ranging from six to ten years. It was supposed at the time the acts were passed that because of the provision in the law, which was in substance that unless the road should be completed within the time required by the granting act, no further disposition of the land should be made, but that the same should revert to the Federal Government—it was believed that that provision in the act of Congress would be self-operative, so that if the road was not constructed as required by this provision of the granting act itself the lands would revert to the General Government and the transaction would be ended.

But later along a question was presented in the case of a defaulting road, which was not completed within the time, to the Supreme Court of the United States as to what a technical, and therefore not an improper, construction of that provision of the law would be. The leading case upon that point is the case of Schulenberg vs. Harriman, reported in the 21st Wallace United States Supreme Court Reports, in which case the Supreme Court decided that all these acts of Congress making such provisions for the disposal of the public lands in aid of the construction of such works and all these grants of public lands the title to which passed by the law itself—that the act of Congress was not only a law, but a conveyance in and of itself, which passed title of the land from the Government to the State or to the corporation named as beneficiaries; and that the condition of the title was such that until by some legislative act, or by some judicial adjudication authorized by Congress, working a forfeiture, so that the lands should be restored to the public domain for breach of condition, the title remained in the State or the company, as the case might be.

That decision was made in the seventies, in 1872 or 1874, I think. No steps were taken in Congress in reference to the matter for many years, and a number of the roads which had been aided by the grants of the public lands, and which had failed to perform the conditions of the grant, had remaining large portions of their roads still unconstructed. But construction was progressing, no action having been taken by Congress to declare a forfeiture, no judicial proceedings authorized by Congress to declare a judicial termination of the grant having been had; and so the railroads went on constructing the roads, and in an early case, after the case of Schulenberg vs. Harriman was decided, the question was presented to the Administration then in power—the Administration of Mr. Hayes—as to whether or not the railroads which were being constructed out of time were not still entitled to the benefits of the lands lying along opposite sides of the road which was thus being constructed.

Mr. Attorney-General Devens delivered a very elaborate opinion in the case, known as the Atlantic and Pacific case, in which, reviewing not only the authorities at hand with reference to it, but basing his argument in the opinion on principle as well, he decided that until Congress should affirmatively act by declaring a forfeiture, or authorizing one to be declared judicially, the roads might go on and construct and be entitled to the lands lying opposite the completed portions of the road thus constructed out of time. That opinion of Attorney-General Devens has been approved and adopted by the Attorneys-General of each Administration since then down to, but not including, the present one. It has been adopted by the Interior Department and has been acquiesced in by the courts everywhere, so far as I know. That condition of things led to the presentation of a question in Congress as to what steps should be taken, if any, with reference to lands thus granted years ago and which were in this condition to which I have already referred: as to whether the railroads might proceed to earn them, if not interfered with by such legislation as is attempted here to-day in the pending bill.

There have been, Mr. Chairman, thirty-seven railroads which have been aided by acts of Congress, which railroads have not been completed within the time required by the acts of Congress making the grants. In twelve of these cases there have been forfeitures; that is to say, in former Congresses there have been forfeitures declared, which have become laws, forfeiting nearly 50,000,000 acres of land and operating upon twelve of these thirty-seven railroads. That leaves twenty-five of these aided roads which have not yet been acted upon. Nine of them have been fully completed since, and have been accepted by the General Government and are now being operated under the burdens which are imposed upon land-grant railroads. Among the burdens are these: they are required to transport troops and munitions of war, all supplies to army posts, and freight connected with military establishments free of any charge whatever, whenever required to do so by the General Government. They are required to transport the mails of the General Government at such compensation as shall be fixed by the Post-Office Department, and which averages from 50 to 65 per cent. of the amount paid to non-aided roads for similar service.

There are some other burdens which are imposed, which are not necessary to be noticed here. These are the principal ones. That leaves, then, sixteen railroads which are now uncompleted, partly built out of time and part not now constructed, and this amendment, which comes from the House Committee on Public Lands, recommends to take every one of these roads, sixteen in number, which have been aided by grants of public land and which are not now constructed and declare a forfeiture of the land which lies opposite such portions of the road as are not now constructed and in operation. That is the substance of this bill.

Mr. DUNNELL. Will the gentleman state whether that includes roads which are now practically constructed?

Mr. PAYSON. I can not make it any plainer. There are sixteen railroads now left, a portion of which railroads are not constructed at all, and this bill proposes as to every one of these sixteen roads, which are all the railroads that there are in the country which have been aided by grants of public land and which are not now completed, to declare a forfeiture of all land lying opposite so much of the road as has not been constructed. I do not know how I can make it any plainer than that.

Mr. DUNNELL. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] is aware that a forfeiture has been withheld in the case of roads that were actually in the process of construction. I desire to know whether this bill does the same thing.

Mr. PAYSON. I do not understand the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. DUNNELL. Whether this bill withholds forfeiture with reference to railroads that are now actually earning their grants.

Mr. PAYSON. I do not understand the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. DUNNELL. I will make an illustration. The gentleman from Illinois is aware that a forfeiture of lands that were granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad was delayed largely under the argument that the road was then acting in good faith, completing the road and earning its grant from month to month. Are there any roads now in process of construction earning any land?

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, nearly all of them affected by this bill are in process of construction, and it is said that they will be constructed; and the Senate bill provided for an extension of time to three different roads in terms, and that leads me to refer to an inquiry made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] when the consideration of this bill began. He inquired how this bill differed from the Senate bill and I answer the two questions together by saying that as to the right of the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad in Mississippi, the Mobile and Girard Railroad in Alabama, the Coosa in Tennessee, and some connecting roads in Tennessee the time was proposed to be extended by the Senate bill within which these roads could be constructed, so that they might earn this grant. That provision was stricken out by the House committee and does not appear here.

Referring to the Northern Pacific road, to which the gentleman alludes, there are 224 miles of that road not now constructed at all, connecting Wallula with Portland. The grant of land to that piece of road amounts in the aggregate in round numbers to about 3,000,000 acres of land. Every now and then the directors of that road express the purpose to go on and construct the line of road and thus to earn that land, in so far as it can be earned; but the scope of this bill is to relieve every acre of public land which can be relieved of this disability to-day, and restore it to the public domain, so that not another acre of public land can be earned by the construction of a railroad hereafter, except by a special act of Congress passed with reference to that construction.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois, with regard to that 250 miles of road on the Northern Pacific, is not that line through such a difficult and mountainous region that the company are desirous of getting rid of that part of the line?

Mr. PAYSON. Oh, no, indeed. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HERMANN], who will follow me in this discussion later on, will explain the exact situation with reference to that. I will say to my friend from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE]—so that he can anticipate what the gentleman from Oregon will say—that there is a line of railroad on the south side of the Columbia River, running from Wallula to Portland, built by a rival corporation, the Oregon Railroad and Navigation Company, which has been operated by the Northern Pacific under a lease for some years. Perhaps that has prevented any attempt to construct the other. I am told by the gentleman from Oregon—and I have been over the ground myself—that there are hundreds and hundreds of thousands of acres of the most fertile land in Oregon that are within the limits of this grant between Wallula and Portland, which will be forfeited by this bill if it shall become a law, as it ought to.

Mr. HERMANN. The Northern Pacific have reached their terminus on Puget Sound by another route or another line of road.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. And received the usual land grant for the same.

Mr. HEARD. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] a question.

Mr. PAYSON. I will yield for a question.

Mr. HEARD. I have not had time to examine the provisions of the bill closely, nor have I had the benefit of the remarks made by the gentleman from Illinois—

Mr. PAYSON. If the gentleman will ask his question I will endeavor to answer it, but my time is running.

Mr. HEARD. I am explaining why it was necessary to ask the question. As I understand, the proposed forfeiture carried by this bill is to the land abutting those sections of the roads which have not been built. Now, there are some of our public men who insist and believe that as to the lands abutting upon sections of the road which were built out of time, they also should be forfeited.

Mr. PAYSON. I am coming to that, and I may as well answer that inquiry of the gentleman now.

Mr. HEARD. Another question I want to ask is, will this bill confirm the title of the railroad company to such land where its line was finished out of time?

Mr. PAYSON. Perhaps I may just as well go to that branch of the subject now. There is no vote that I know of, and there never has been a sentiment against the principle contained in this bill. It has been thought by very many in public life that the committee ought to cover that, that there ought to be a forfeiture declared of land lying opposite a road constructed out of time; and there have been those who have thought that where a railroad company failed to complete any part of its contract there ought to be a forfeiture of the entire grant. There have been these views on the part of gentlemen concerning these public lands ever since this matter has been agitated. Three classes of forfeiture have been pressed upon the attention of Congress, the first being that where there was a failure in any part a forfeiture of the entire grant should be made. Some gentlemen think that. Others have thought that a restricted forfeiture of land lying opposite a road that was not constructed in time, that is, the land lying opposite the road constructed out of time, as well as the character of land embraced in this bill, should be declared forfeited.

This House has, in two Congresses, adopted such a bill as that. In the Forty-ninth and Fiftieth Congresses a bill was passed upon the principle that there should be a forfeiture of land lying opposite a road constructed out of time, as well as one not constructed at all. That bill went to the Senate, but it failed there because the sentiment in the Senate was practically unanimous against the policy of declaring forfeited lands lying opposite roads constructed out of time and against the power of Congress to do so. Because the House insisted upon the broad forfeiture and the Senate refused to yield, the bills have failed. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, the House, or the Committee on Public Lands, present this bill, about which there is no dispute and in favor of which there would be a practically unanimous vote in both Houses if this should become a law; and it is to relieve the situation of any difficulty as to lands lying opposite roads constructed out of time.

But the minority of the committee, led by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE], will present to this bill an amendment going to the length of the inquiry suggested by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HEARD], and when that question shall be presented I desire by the courtesy of the committee to present my views in reference to it. But I wish to say in passing that it is the opinion of the majority that no bill broader in character than that which is under consideration could pass the Senate or ever become a law. We have agitated this question for years in both Houses of Congress. We have passed twelve forfeiture bills during the time I have named, aggregating something like 50,000,000 acres of public lands, and no bill has ever gone further in declaring forfeited lands than the bill reported by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HEARD. Now the other inquiry, as to whether it will have the effect of confirming any title in a railroad to such lands where the road was finished out of time.

Mr. PAYSON. Now, I am coming to the inquiry of my friend as to whether it will have the effect of confirming any title, or whether it shall prevent Congress from acting hereafter if it desired. That is covered by the seventh section, which I will read:

That nothing in this act shall be construed to waive or release in any way any right of the United States to have any other lands granted by them, as recited in the first section, forfeited for any failure, past or future, to comply with the conditions of the grant.

That is reserving the right on the part of Congress to do anything it may choose hereafter in any other form it pleases with reference to this very character of land.

Mr. HEARD. That is satisfactory, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. PAYSON. I ought to say that, as to the first character of land where there has been a breach of the conditions, there was power to declare an entire forfeiture, and I ought to say in connection with what I have stated in reference to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], my colleague on the Committee on Public Lands, proposes to offer an amendment to the first section of this bill, declaring an entire forfeiture of the land where the entire conditions are not complied with within the time. The majority of the committee think, as I have stated, that the best policy is to take all these lands by the method suggested by this bill and to which there is no objection and restore them to the public domain, and not to complicate it with these other questions about which there is this difference of opinion.

Mr. HEARD. Without barring the Government as to any further action.

Mr. PAYSON. Precisely. Now, Mr. Chairman, unless some gentleman desires to ask a question I will not detain the House further.

Mr. DUNNELL. I would like to ask the gentleman one question. He has stated once the amount of land that has been heretofore restored to the public domain. Will he state how many acres of land will be returned to the public domain by the operations of this bill?

Mr. PAYSON. The information that I obtained from the General Land Office is that it is about in round numbers 7,500,000 acres; some of the amounts are estimated. That is as accurate as they can make it at the Land Office.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not desire to occupy the floor at this time, but I wish to offer an amendment to the first section of the amendment proposed by the committee in order that it may be pending.

Mr. MCRAE. Amendments are not now in order. General debate is not closed.

The CHAIRMAN. If the point is made that general debate has not yet been closed, the amendment can not be offered at this time.

Mr. MCRAE. There are several gentlemen who desire to speak to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana will please withhold his amendment for the present.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Chairman, there are several gentlemen who want to speak upon this bill and to compare it with the Senate bill, and I hope that they will have an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. PAYSON. There will be no abridgment of the right of debate so far as I am concerned.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Chairman, the subject of forfeiting land grants to railroads is one that has been before Congress a great many years, and, as stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON], something like a dozen forfeitures have been declared under the former practice of the House of treating each grant in a separate bill. This is an omnibus bill, which deals with all of the railroad grants which are now subject to forfeiture, and perhaps they can as well be dealt with in a single bill as in separate ones.

I have examined this bill sufficiently to know that it is in exact accordance with the right of the Government to forfeit these land grants, as I have contended in former Congresses. In the Forty-eighth Congress, when I had the honor of being a member of the Committee on Public Lands, my attention was for the first time drawn particularly to this question. From an examination of the grants and of the authorities bearing upon them, I then became satisfied that they were grants in present, which passed the title, subject to forfeiture for non-performance of the conditions-subsequent.

Every lawyer knows that estates on condition are of two kinds or characters. An estate upon condition-precedent is one in which the title stands never vested until the condition upon which the grant is made is fully performed. None of these railroad land grants are of that character. They are grants upon conditions-subsequent. The rule in this character of conditional estate is that for non-performance of the condition or conditions a forfeiture does not result eo instanti by the lapse of time allowed for its performance, but that, in order to effect it, action is required upon the part of the grantor. In the case of private grants, if you make a grant to your neighbor upon the condition that he perform or do certain things within one year or five years, and he fails to do that thing within the time, it then becomes your right to re-enter or repossess yourself of the estate granted, and that action on your part determines his estate, and you are repossessed and reinvested with the full title. But suppose you do not re-enter and repossess your right, then the grant in law remains good, and notwithstanding the time has elapsed and your opportunity is presented there is no forfeiture until you do act.

Therefore I have contended all the time that as to these grants to railroad corporations by the Government, if the Government did not take action to forfeit the grants at the expiration of the period of time within which the roads were to be completed and the conditions complied with, the grants would remain good in law, and the grantee companies could go on performing the conditions, and if the grantor permitted them to be entirely performed, it would make no difference as to the character of the estate, and when the conditions were fully performed, the opportunity of the grantor for declaring a forfeiture would be forever gone. That is the rule as between individuals, and it ought to be the rule applicable to the Government, on the principle of estoppel. While technical estoppel does not apply to the Government of the United States, the Government ought always to conform to it; for the principle that "the king can do no wrong" has no application to our form of government.

Now, this bill declares a forfeiture of all the lands granted to every railroad company to the extent that the company has not constructed its road. If a grant is made to a company to construct a road, say of 100 miles in length, and it has constructed but 50 miles, this bill allows the company to take one-half of the land grant because one-half of the road is constructed, and forfeits the other half to the Government. Hence I approve the bill. And right here I wish to speak more particularly of a railroad company in which the people I have the honor to represent here are in part interested. I refer to the Mobile and Girard Railroad of Alabama, which runs through a part of the district I represent. The grant of that company was made in 1856 and the limit of the grant was 6 miles; the indemnity limit, 15 miles. The company constructed a part of its road, from Girard to Troy, a distance of 84 miles, which is in full operation, and has for years been treated by the Government as a land-grant railroad; and, for transporting troops just after the close of the war and for transporting the mails ever since, has been subjected to the conditions of reduced pay set forth in the granting act. For these 84 miles the company is entitled to 307,200 acres of land.

Another railroad company built its road upon a part of the line of this road, from Pollard to the Tensas River, which was surveyed by this company and the lands withdrawn in accordance with the grant. By some arrangement this other company constructed its road on the right of way of the Mobile and Girard Company for about 50 miles. While in law the Mobile and Girard Company had the right to sell, transfer, and convey their land grant to another company, I do not think that due formalities of transfer were entered into between these two corporations, and therefore I do not believe that the corporation which built its road on this part of the right of way is entitled to any portion of the grant. But as to the right of the Mobile and Girard Company to the land grant for the 84 miles constructed, from Girard to Troy, I have no doubt. Now, along this line there was comparatively a small amount of public land, perhaps not more than 20,000 acres, which the company could obtain contiguous with the constructed roads, but, from the peculiar character of this grant—and there are many others like it; in fact it is the form in which nearly all of them were made at that time—this company had a right to sell one hundred and twenty sections before they stuck a spade in the ground, and, furthermore, when they could not find the lands they were entitled to by sections within the limits of the grant, they had the right to go within the indemnity limits anywhere along the line of the grant and take such a number of acres of land as they had earned by construction.

Some time after this grant, I think about the year of 1867 or 1868, the Government of the United States, acting through the Secretary of the Interior, issued patents or titles to all these lands which were granted to the State of Alabama in trust for this company, and turned them over to the State. Then by an act of the Legislature, which I think was improvidently and inconsiderately passed, these evidences of title were all turned over to the railroad company. The company since that time has sold a considerable quantity of this land; a portion, being timber land, has been leased to some saw-mill companies, and another portion the railroad company has allowed to be sold by the State for taxes accruing thereon. Gentlemen are all familiar with the principle that whenever a patent is issued for lands the United States Government parts with the title and the lands are then subject to taxation. So that the State of Alabama, when once these lands had become the property of the railroad corporation, had a right to collect taxes on them.

The only question which could be made against the State would be whether it carried out in good faith the trust reposed in it. But at any rate, in the view that I take of this particular matter, it does not make any difference. It is quite certain that the railroad company has disposed of only something over 200,000 acres of this granted land—less than 250,000 acres I should say.

Now, at the proper time—and I wish the particular attention of members of the committee to this proposition—I desire to offer the following amendment, which relates only to the lands of this particular grant and which is in the form of an amendment to the second proviso of the first section:

And provided, That the Mobile and Girard Railroad Company of Alabama shall be entitled to the quantity of land earned by the construction of their road from Girard to Troy, a distance of 84 miles—

This excludes the claim for road constructed upon the southern end of the grant—

And the Secretary of the Interior, in making settlement and assigning the said company the lands earned thereby, shall include therein all the lands sold, conveyed, or otherwise disposed of by said company, including such as have been sold for taxes, not to exceed the total amount earned by said company. And the titles of the purchasers to all such lands are hereby confirmed, so far as the United States are concerned therein.

Now, a word of explanation in regard to that. Here is a railroad corporation which has earned over 300,000 acres of land; it has sold or in some manner parted with we will say 250,000 acres, scattered all along the line of the grant. I have been informed that the company sold some of these lands for 10 cents an acre; but that does not matter, in the view that I take of this question.

As the company has earned over 300,000 acres and has parted with nearly 250,000 acres, my proposition is that when the Secretary of the Interior comes to adjust with the company the amount of land they are entitled to for the road they have constructed he shall include in the three hundred thousand and odd acres earned by the company all the lands which they have sold or conveyed to and put in the possession of other parties.

Now, the United States are not interested in this. You are certainly going to give to that railroad company the number of acres it has earned by the construction of the 84 miles of road. The United States, therefore, are not interested at all in what disposition the company shall make of the lands which it has earned and which are its own.

Mr. CORB. Is that company still in existence?

Mr. OATES. Oh, of course it is. The road is operated now under a lease to the Georgia Central.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. What disposition does this bill, without the amendment, make of the land? I ask this question for information.

Mr. OATES. The language of the bill leaves room for doubt on that point, as I will show. The first section declares—

That there are hereby forfeited to the United States, and the United States hereby resumes the title thereto, all lands heretofore granted to any State or to any corporation to aid in the construction of a railroad opposite to and contiguous with the portion of any such railroad not now completed.

Take this bill on its face and it would cut off that company with 20,000 acres only, because contiguous with the road you would only be able to find 20,000 acres. But in the grant itself, the original contract, the company had a right, not finding the land it was entitled to in place, to go anywhere along the line of the indemnity limits and take the quantity of land it earned by the construction of the road.

Taking the granting act in connection with this first section, I think a court would hold that the company was entitled to the lands it had earned by the construction of so many miles of road. But the amendment I offer can not hurt anybody. It simply makes the language plain and unmistakable as to this company. On the principle on which the bill proceeds, the company is entitled to the 300,000 acres it has earned by constructing so many miles of road. Now, I say if you concede that proposition, then what the company does with those 300,000 acres is a matter in which this House and the United States are not at all concerned. But, inasmuch as they have sold, conveyed, or parted with nearly 250,000 acres, I say it is right, it is equitable, it is giving them their proper status before the courts and the country to include in the 300,000 acres the lands which this company has sold and conveyed.

Now, a word or two more in that line to show you that what I say is true and pre-eminently right. During the present year, under instruction from the Attorney-General of the United States, the district attorney has filed a bill in the circuit court of the United States to declare the lands embraced within this particular grant forfeited, and has also issued writs of seizure; and the marshal has gone through that section of country and upon these lands, where there are a great many large saw-mills and lumbering establishments, and has seized a large quantity of logs and lumber. In some cases they have been replevied and in others the property is still in the marshal's hands.

Now, I would not interfere with the rights of the parties, if I could, in respect to this litigation, by legislation; but I am of opinion, and I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON], who is very familiar with the law touching this question, will agree with me, that in the absence of legislation the bill brought in this particular case is, perhaps, not well founded and can not be sustained. That is my opinion of it; and, anyway, I would not legislate so as to interfere with the litigation in the court. But you will all see the proposition which I advance in this amendment, that if the railroad corporation is entitled to more than all of these lands which it has conveyed and put these saw-mill men in possession of, where they have invested their money and are now being harassed by litigation, that it ought not to be taken away, where the lands were rightfully owned or may be charged to the corporation in making its settlement with the United States.

I am proceeding on the hypothesis that there is no doubt that this House and the Senate will allow (for I think it is so under the bill even without the amendment or that the bill would mean that) the lands to this corporation which it has earned by the construction of that portion of the road; and, if so, why forfeit the lands upon which these industrial establishments are situated and further disturb and complicate matters when the railroad company has earned enough lands to make the title good to these parties?

Let me make this further remark, Mr. Chairman, that I am in favor of the substitute offered by the committee for the Senate bill. I am opposed, unalterably opposed, to the proposition in the Senate bill which grants one year's time to this among other railroad companies to complete the construction of their road.

I will reserve the remainder of my time until I hear whether there is any objection to the proposition I have suggested.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has occupied twenty-five minutes.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Chairman, this dispute between the House and the Senate as to what lands are subject to forfeiture has up to this time proven very unprofitable to the Government. In the Forty-eighth Congress many bills sent over by the House to the Senate were disagreed to by the latter body, and, the House and the Senate failing to come to an agreement, the bills fell. The House contended, as the gentleman who has just addressed us [Mr. STONE, of Missouri] still contends, that all lands were subject to forfeiture which had not been earned by the completion of the roads within the time given by the several granting acts. The Senate always contended, upon the other hand, that no lands were forfeitable except those that had not been earned by the completion of the roads contiguous with the lands at the time of the passage of the forfeiture act.

The failure of these bills in the Forty-eighth Congress resulted, according to the theory of the Senate, in giving further time to the railroad companies, and many of these companies availed themselves of this time by pushing on the work of building. So it was, sir, that when we came back to the Forty-ninth Congress there were 25,000,000 or perhaps 30,000,000 acres less of lands upon which the House and the Senate could agree than there had been in the Forty-eighth Congress.

Then, when we came to the Fiftieth Congress the roads had been so far completed that there were only about 5,000,000 acres left as to which the House and the Senate could agree that they were forfeitable and ought to be forfeited. In the last Congress the Committee on Public Lands put all the lands they proposed to forfeit into one bill, passed it through this House, and sent it to the Senate. That House bill proposed to forfeit 50,000,000 acres. I voted for that bill as it passed the House. But it came back to us so amended as to forfeit only about 5,000,000 acres. There were many of us here who then thought that the House ought to accept what the Senate would agree to do and forfeit all the lands that we could then forfeit; in other words, that we ought to be practical and do what could be done; but we were unable to reach a vote on the question, and so no lands were forfeited at all. And now we come here to the Fifty-first Congress, and many of these companies have still further extended their roads, and have earned their lands according to the claim of the Senate, so that to-day I suppose—I have not the figures exactly, but I suppose there are one or two million less acres of land carried in this bill than were carried in the bill which was sent back to us from the Senate at the first session of the Fiftieth Congress.

Now the question is, Shall we agree to forfeit all the lands that it is possible to agree on? For one, I think we should take what we can get. In my opinion now, looking back, we ought to have done that in the Fiftieth Congress. Whatever gentlemen may think as to the law of this question of forfeiture the practical question for us is, What can we do? How many acres of land can we turn back to the Government of the United States or to the people? This dispute has resulted very unfortunately in many portions of the country, especially so in the district I have the honor to represent.

My colleague [Mr. OATES] submitted awhile ago an amendment in relation to the Mobile and Girard Railroad land grant in which I most heartily concur. I had a similar amendment ready to offer; in fact it is intended to carry out the very bill that I introduced at the beginning of the Fiftieth Congress and also at the beginning of the Fifty-first Congress and sent before the Committee on Public Lands for consideration. That was to protect the rights of purchasers. I most earnestly insist that the amendment ought to be adopted. The conditions along the line of the Mobile and Girard Railroad illustrate very forcibly the misfortune of our failure heretofore to settle this question. Along the line of that road there are many who have bought from the railroad company, while there are others who have bought from the State of Alabama and at tax sales. Great anxiety has existed and exists now as to what is to become of the titles of the people in possession of those lands. Industry has been crippled, the settlement of the country has been retarded, and I, as a Representative of that people, am extremely anxious that this bill shall pass, and that that question shall be settled as it ought to have been settled heretofore. I can not see any sound reason for allowing this question to remain open when we know perfectly well that the Senate will not consent to the forfeiture of a larger number of acres than are contained in this bill. There is no reasonable prospect of a change in the political complexion of the Senate or that a change will occur in its views for many years to come, and this question ought to be settled now.

To address myself particularly to the amendment, let me remind the committee, as my colleague [Mr. OATES] did, that the grant to the Mobile and Girard Railroad Company was made in 1856, a long time ago. After the completion of a portion of the road the lands along the whole line of the road were certified by the Commissioner of the General Land Office in the State of Alabama for the use of that railroad company. Gentlemen may say that people who purchased those lands ought to have known, if the road was not fully completed, that the titles that they got from the company to lands not continuous with the completed portions of the road were not good. It is easy enough to say that men ought to have known it, but the fact is that intelligent, honest business men did not know it, if it was so. Many of these purchasers have been advised by able lawyers that their titles were good, that the company had earned these lands and had a right to select them, so many sections of land for each section of road completed, and to select them anywhere along the line of the road. They believed the title was good. They looked to the fact that the land had been certified by the proper authority, the Commissioner of the General Land Office of the United States, to the State of Alabama, for the benefit of the road. That, according to their opinion, vested the title of the land in the railroad company, the State being simply the trustee and the railroad company the cestui que trust. So they bought those lands; they paid their money for them; they went on improving them.

I have here in my hand a deed made to Mr. F. J. McCoy for 640 acres of that land. It is true the consideration he paid for it was only 50 cents an acre, but at the time he paid that money the lands along the line of that road were not considered worth more than that sum. And to show that he was honest and earnest in this matter he has put up, as he writes me—and he is a gentleman whose word can always be trusted—he has put up on that section of land improvements costing $20,000 at least. Many others have settled upon those lands and made homes there. Others have bought and taken possession of the land for the sake of the timber upon it or for the purpose of making turpentine. They have paid for the land just as honestly as Mr. McCoy did. They have invested their money and are improving it to-day just as honestly as he did; so that they are entitled to the equitable consideration of this House. It seems to me that under these circumstances it is only right that this amendment should be adopted.

I have stated that always heretofore I have voted with those who were in favor of forfeiting the largest number of acres. I did so, not because I was clear upon the law, as I had not had time to consider the question carefully; I was inclined to think, and have always been, that, according to the principles laid down in Schulenberg vs. Harriman, the Senate was probably right; but I voted for the forfeiture, not being clear upon the question, with the idea that if any wrong was done the courts would correct it.

Now, according to the principle laid down in this case this railroad company has earned a very much larger number of acres than are comprised in this amendment of my colleague. The amendment proposes to confine the road to these particular lands, so as to give to the purchasers the title the road would otherwise have. And I hope no gentleman here will vote against that proposition. It is equitable; it is right, whatever you may think of the law. If gentlemen say the case of Schulenberg vs. Harriman does not apply, if they take an extreme view on this question, nevertheless it is a fact that these people on those lands, although they may not technically be, according to that view of the law, bona fide purchasers for a valuable consideration without notice, because they were charged with notice of every defect of title that could have been found by running the chain back, nevertheless they did not take that view of the law; they did not so look upon the question; but they did buy these lands, they did improve them, and they are on them to-day.

Now, there is a provision in the bill that all those who were actual settlers upon the land shall be entitled to a homestead by preference upon the land on which they are. That is all well enough. But, Mr. Chairman, this bill ought to go further than that; and I have an amendment here which I propose to offer upon this question of homesteads, and which I hope the House will agree to. I read it now in order to give notice that I shall offer it at the proper time:

Insert at the end of section 2 the following:
"And all lands suited to agricultural purposes and forfeited by this bill, as to which no specific provision is herein made, shall hereafter be subject to entry only under the homestead laws of the United States."

We had this question before us in the Fiftieth Congress, and then passed a general bill on this subject; but it possibly does not cover the lands embraced in this bill. It ought to be made certain that all the agricultural lands belonging to the Government should hereafter be reserved only for agricultural settlers.

Mr. HERMANN. What does the gentleman say in regard to those settlers who have entered on lands with the intention of purchasing them under the pre-emption law? Would he cut them off?

Mr. HERBERT. No, sir; I would include them. I am willing to accept an amendment for that purpose, which is entirely in accordance with the spirit of my amendment. My impression is that the bill as reported will cover the case of pre-emptions; but, if the gentleman from Oregon finds such is not the fact, I am perfectly willing, before my amendment is offered, to modify it by adding such a provision as he suggests.

Mr. Chairman, both the great parties of this country are committed to the idea that all the public lands which are fitted for homes should be reserved as such for the people; and I know of no bill upon which that principle can be asserted, upon which that idea can be carried out more fitly and appropriately than this bill relating to the forfeiture of lands heretofore granted to railroad corporations.

It seems to have been the policy of this country in times now long past to give the public lands to corporations in order to build up the country. Experience has shown that while we were building up the country we were building up too many great corporations to control the country. So we now have adopted the other idea, that we ought no more to give the public lands to corporations, but should give all of them to the people for homes. Let us make the provisions of this bill so certain that there can be no possible doubt about the meaning of the law.

How much time have I occupied?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has occupied seventeen minutes.

Mr. HERBERT. I do not know that I shall care to occupy the floor again, but I will reserve the time.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the Supreme Court of the United States has frequently decided that a Congressional land grant which is subject to forfeiture on account of non-compliance by the grantee with the conditions of the grant may be forfeited in either one of two ways: First, by a direct legislative declaration of forfeiture expressed in an act of Congress and, secondly, by the finding and judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction in a suit begun and prosecuted by the authority of an act of Congress for the purpose of obtaining a forfeiture. One is a legislative forfeiture, the other a judicial forfeiture.

According to the oft-repeated decisions of the Supreme Court, Congress is at liberty to adopt either method. It may simply declare the lands forfeited or it may direct a judicial inquiry into the facts and authorize a judgment of forfeiture on the finding. I assume there will be no controversy as to this statement.

Now, the bills passed or proposed in the Forty-seventh, Forty-eighth, Forty-ninth, and Fiftieth Congresses were all bills for a direct legislative forfeiture. This question of forfeiting lands granted to aid in the construction of railroads received its first legislative attention during the sessions of the Forty-seventh Congress. In all the Congresses since the Forty-seventh it has been a question of commanding interest and of great public concern.

Almost from the very beginning of this forfeiture legislation a conflict arose between the two Houses of Congress as to how far the proposed forfeitures should extend. The House of Representatives took the position that Congress had the legal right to forfeit and that it was its duty to forfeit and restore to the public domain all that portion of the granted lands along or adjacent to which no road had been constructed at the dates fixed in the granting acts for the completion of the roads.

On the other hand the Senate took the position that the forfeitures should be limited to that portion of the lands which lie along or adjacent to so much of the several roads as remained unconstructed at the date of the passage and approval of the act of forfeiture. Let me illustrate: In 1864 Congress incorporated the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, and authorized it to construct a line of road from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, with a branch running from the main line along the valley of the Columbia to the city of Portland.

To aid in the construction of that road Congress granted to the company a certain number of alternate sections of the public lands, running along on either side of the road throughout its entire length. This land grant aggregated about 47,000,000 acres. Now, this act of Congress and acts supplementary thereto provided, among other things, that the grant was made and accepted upon the express condition that the road should be fully completed and in operation, from end to end, by July 4, 1879.

On July 4, 1879, the road was not completed. It had been partly constructed, that is to say, from its eastern terminus on Lake Superior out to Bismarck, on the Missouri River. West of Bismarck, running through Dakota, Montana, Idaho, and Washington, not a foot of road had been constructed up to July 4, 1879. Since that time, notwithstanding the period limited for the completion of the road, and which was expressly made a condition of the grant, had then expired, the company has practically completed its main line between Bismarck and Puget Sound. The branch line along the Columbia River, and possibly a small fraction of the main line, still remains unconstructed.

Now, the policy of the House, with reference to this road, has been to forfeit and restore to public uses all the granted lands which lie west of Bismarck, covering that part of the grant which had not been "earned" by the construction of road up to July 4, 1879. The policy of the Senate has been to forfeit only so much of the lands as now still remain "unearned" by actual construction. Under the policy of the House the railroad company would be left undisturbed in the possession and use of the lands lying along the road between Lake Superior and Bismarck, which was constructed prior to July 4, 1879, and its title to those lands would be in effect confirmed by the limitation placed on the act of forfeiture.

Under the policy of the Senate the company would be left in the possession of all lands lying along any constructed road, whether east or west of Bismarck, and without regard to the date of construction. The Senate makes no distinction in law, equity, or public policy, between road constructed before and road constructed after the date fixed in the granting act for its completion.

That illustrates the contention and the issue between the two Houses of Congress. Along that line of policy the House, in the Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth Congresses, passed its forfeiture bills and sent them over to the Senate.

The Senate amended them so as to restrict the forfeitures to the lands still "unearned." And so the issue was joined on this single proposition: Can Congress and shall Congress forfeit lands continuous with road constructed after the date fixed in the granting act for the completion of the road? Along that line the battle has been fought. The House, however, during the Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth Congresses did not allow a mere policy to stand in the way of practical results.

In cases where it made little difference in the amount of lands restored whether the forfeiture was predicated on the Senate theory or the House theory, the House yielded in order to reach results. The House yielded when it could do so without sacrificing much in the general outcome; it refused to yield when the difference in the amount involved was important. In that way several forfeiture bills were passed during the Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth Congresses.

During those two Congresses bills were passed forfeiting in the aggregate 50,482,240 acres. Those forfeitures closed up all the larger grants on which it was possible for the two Houses to agree, unless one or the other should give way and surrender the substance of the issue between them. So far in the forfeitures made the House yielded and the Senate had its way. Only "unearned" lands were forfeited. But the House yielded and permitted the Senate to have its way because, as to the grants affected by the bills which passed, the difference in actual results was not important.

Then came the Fiftieth Congress. Up to this time we had not attempted a general forfeiture bill, but each grant had been separately treated by a separate bill. Now, however, when the Fiftieth Congress met a general forfeiture bill was introduced in each House. The Senate bill provided for the forfeiture of all "unearned" lands.

The House bill also provided for the forfeiture of all "unearned lands," and in addition thereto provided for the forfeiture of all lands "earned out of time." We had now reached the point in this legislation when the issue between the two Houses must be fairly met. Hitherto the House had yielded in special cases, because, as I have said, no important difference in results was involved. But now further concession or yielding meant absolute surrender.

The Senate got its general bill through first, and sent it over to the House. It provided for the forfeiture of all "unearned" lands or lands where no road had been constructed. The House amended the bill so as to forfeit also all lands "earned out of time," or lands continuous with road constructed after the dates fixed in the grants for the completion of the roads. If the Senate proposition succeeded the amount of land forfeited would be 6,180,803 acres. If the House proposition succeeded, the forfeiture would amount to 54,323,996 acres. The issue between the two Houses, therefore, involved the ownership of 48,143,193 acres, of which 34,217,741 acres were claimed by the Northern Pacific. That was the issue between the two Houses.

The Senate rejected the amendment of the House. The House insisted upon the amendment. In consequence of this disagreement the Fiftieth Congress adjourned without enacting any forfeiture legislation, or practically so.

Now, the question in your minds, gentlemen, must be this: Why did the Senate refuse to agree to the House amendment? I can tell you what they said. Whether they gave the real reason or concealed it, I do not know; but I can tell you what they said. A majority of the Senators having this legislation in charge, asserted, as a legal proposition, that Congress has no right or power to forfeit lands continuous with constructed road without regard to the date of construction. We replied to them that that was a question about which eminent lawyers differed.

The attorneys of the railroads and the railroad lobby were all agreed that Congress had no power to forfeit "earned lands," whether earned "in time" or "out of time." But there were other great lawyers and jurists in the country, not employed by railroads or interested in them, who held to the contrary. Then we were told by them that in view of the uncertain state of the law it would be unwise and imprudent legislation to enact the House proposition into a statute, for the reason that thousands of people, relying upon the authority of an act of Congress, would go upon the disputed lands and settle, and that in the course of time the railroad companies would sue them in ejectment, bring the cases here to the Supreme Court, and if they succeeded, as the Senators thought they would, in having the court declare that Congress had exceeded its power and set the act of forfeiture aside, that infinite confusion and harm would be the result.

Those were the grounds upon which the Senators ostensibly based their objection to the adoption of the House amendment. Personally I had no faith in that contention, but it was plausible. If an act of forfeiture should be passed; if large numbers of people, relying upon it, should settle upon the forfeited lands and improve them, and if after that the Supreme Court should declare the act of forfeiture void and uphold the title of the railroad companies, the confusion and distress apprehended and prophesied might result. So I say that contention had on it a plausible face.

Now comes the Fifty-first Congress. When this Congress convened I introduced a forfeiture bill which I believed would allay these sensitive apprehensions of certain Senators, to which I have alluded, and remove the ground of objection upon which they predicated their opposition to the House measure in the Fiftieth Congress. I divided my bill into two parts. The first part related to the 6,180,803 acres of "unearned lands," or those lands as to the forfeiture of which there is no disagreement. That part of the bill provided for a direct legislative declaration of forfeiture. The provisions of that part of the bill were substantially the same throughout as the bill which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] has reported and which we are now considering.

The second part of my bill related to the 48,143,193 acres of lands "earned out of time," or those lands which Senators said they were afraid to declare forfeited for fear an after adverse decision of the Supreme Court might create confusion and entail suffering upon the settlers. That part of the bill, briefly stated, directs the Attorney-General of the United States to institute suits in the circuit courts of the United States against the corporations claiming these lands, to have those courts find the facts and then to decide, as a matter of law, whether lands of that character are subject to forfeiture, and if so to have judgments entered declaring them forfeited.

Appeals and writs of error to the Supreme Court are provided for, and both the circuit and Supreme Courts are directed to advance the cases to a hearing in preference to all other civil cases on their dockets.

Whenever any final judgment of forfeiture shall be rendered it is provided that the forfeited lands shall thereafter be and become a part of the public domain; in other words, that part of the bill proposes that the question in dispute, the forfeitability of the lands "earned out of time," be submitted to the courts, and if the holding be in favor of the Government then to have judgments of forfeiture entered.

If the judgment be in favor of the Government, then there are provisions in the bill to protect purchasers and settlers, and which regulate the disposition of the lands forfeited and restored by the decree of the court. If the judgment should be in favor of the railroads, why, that would be the end of it. In other words, as to the lands about which there is no dispute I propose a legislative forfeiture; as to the lands about which there is dispute I propose a judicial forfeiture.

If that bill should pass the House and go to the Senate it would put an end to the objection urged in the Fiftieth Congress to which I have alluded. There could be no entry or settlement, there could be no declaration of intention to settle, the local officers would have no jurisdiction over the lands, they would remain in statu quo until the final judgment of the Supreme Court.

What was done with that bill? It was referred by Mr. Speaker REED to the Public Lands Committee, of which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] is the chairman. That committee cut the bill in twain. The first half of it, that which provides for a direct forfeiture of the "unearned lands," was merged in the bill reported by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] and now being considered. The half of it, that which relates to the lands in dispute and which provides for judicial proceedings, was formed into a separate measure, and I was directed to report that.

In other words the committee, instead of treating the whole subject in one bill, has divided it, and two bills have been brought into the House, one for the direct forfeiture of the "unearned lands," being the bill now under consideration, and one directing the Attorney-General to institute suits in the Federal courts to obtain a judicial forfeiture of lands "earned out of time." That bill I shall offer as an amendment to the pending bill. I propose to consolidate the two propositions here, as I did in my original bill, and dispose of the whole subject at once.

Mr. SAYERS. Will it interfere with the gentleman if I ask him a question?

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Not at all.

Mr. SAYERS. I would like to know from the gentleman whether the proposition insisted upon by the House in the last Congress appears in either of these bills or in the minority report.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. No, sir; the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] proposes, as I understand, to offer, as an amendment to the first section of the pending bill, the proposition which the House passed and insisted on in the Fiftieth Congress. But I have abandoned that myself, because I do not believe that proposition can pass so long as the Senate remains as it is to-day. And I believe the proposition which I submit is preferable anyhow; because, if the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], who has been so good as to give me his attention, will reflect, he will see that if the proposition passed by the House and insisted upon by it during the last Congress should be enacted into law, it would forfeit land to which the railroad companies claim title; that is to say, it would forfeit lands earned by the railroad companies "out of time," as it is usually expressed. And if the House should pass that proposition it would meet the same objection with which it was confronted in the Senate in the Fiftieth Congress, and which I have already explained.

Mr. SAYERS. Then I understand your proposition is designed to respond to objections raised by the Senate in conference committee.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Yes, sir; my proposition is to send these questions to the courts in advance and have the courts pass, first upon the question whether the lands are subject to forfeiture, and, if so, to declare them forfeited. The Supreme Court has decided over and over again that that is one of the methods of forfeiture which may be adopted.

The real question before the House, then, is upon the adoption of the amendment I shall propose. Are you in favor of the proposition embodied in the amendment? That interrogatory raises two questions, one of law and one of policy, though the question of law involved is the very thing I propose to submit to the determination of the courts.

Both these questions of law and policy have been ably and elaborately discussed here in former Congresses. It might be well, Mr. Chairman, in this connection to recall some things said here on this floor a few brief years ago, since it may serve the double purpose of enlightening the House as to its duty in this emergency and of reviving the laggard memory of that impassioned orator whose lips gave fervid utterance to these glowing sentences.

On July 26, 1886, a bill forfeiting the Northern Pacific grant was under consideration by the House. The Senate had a bill and the House had a bill. The very issue between the two Houses to which I have referred, namely, the extent of the forfeiture, was the issue then being discussed. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON], in a speech made by him on that day, said:

I have said, Mr. Speaker, that I am in favor of the House bill and opposed to that of the Senate; and having given the facts as I understand them I reach the point to state the reasons. Involved in this case, as in every other of like character, are two questions: First, the question of power; second, the question of policy; that is to say, first, whether we have the legal right or authority under the law to declare a forfeiture of these lands; secondly, if the first point should be established affirmatively, whether as a matter of policy, as a matter of fair dealing under all the circumstances of the case, the power that Congress has ought to be exercised.

Now, let us see what he thought of the first question, that is, the power of Congress to declare the forfeiture. After discussing that question at some length, in the speech from which I have just quoted, he said:

We conclude, then, on the legal question of power in Congress (and we are only dealing with the abstract legal question now) that it has the right, first, to declare the title to all unpatented lands in the grant forfeited, and revest the United States with it, so that it can be restored to the public domain open to sale and settlement under existing laws.

Again, further on in the same speech:

Let me put it in another way: It is admitted that they have not built the Cascade Branch, even now, and that they have not built the road from Wallula to Portland, 214 miles, and have practically abandoned that part of the route.

Now, sir, for this non-user of the franchise have we not the legal right to forfeit it, now and here? Unquestionably; and, if so, have we not the right to the incident—the land grant?

I am only now discussing the question of power, of strict legal right.

Gentlemen say "the law abhors a forfeiture," and this is a frequent text in this case. If it were so the law would be very like the gentlemen who quote the maxim.

But it is not so; the law is the reverse, as expressly decided in the Farnsworth case (92 United States). There the court says that while forfeiture is not favored as between individuals where compensation can be made, yet in case of public grants like this the courts can not and ought not to relieve, and that the maxim quoted does not apply.

We had the power to assert this forfeiture in 1879, and the authorities I have cited show that we have it now as a legal right beyond all question. Should it be exercised? That is a question of policy, and to that I now address myself.

But before following him into the question of policy let me make one additional quotation from the gentleman on the question of power. On April 4, 1884, a bill forfeiting a grant made to the Oregon Central Railroad Company was pending. During the discussion the following colloquy occurred:

Mr. HERR. Now, do I understand the gentleman's position to be this: If a company goes on and completes a certain portion of its road in good faith under the terms of its contract, and is allowed to have lands patented as certain portions of the road are completed, it may go on and build perhaps 120 miles in that way, and then, because the company does not build the rest of the road within the time, the Government has an equitable and moral right to declare the entire land forfeited and take away from the company what it has earned?

Mr. PAYSON. When the gentleman asks what we have a "moral right" to do, that is a question which every member will settle for himself. If he asks whether we have a legal right to do it, I say unhesitatingly yes; and I have never heard any lawyer, except some attorney for a railroad company, who ever denied the proposition.

Mr. SAYERS. And that, notwithstanding that the patents had been issued?

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Yes, sir.

Again, the gentleman said:

But unless there is some restriction in the act on the extent of the forfeiture where it is exercised, it extends to the whole estate granted.

I undertake to say, Mr. Speaker, without any assumption or any affectation of learning with reference to this question, that gentlemen who oppose this bill can not find a single case that equities in the direction of affirming that, where there is no limitation upon the extent of forfeiture in the act of Congress or the Legislature making the grant, the power does not extend to the entire thing granted. No matter into whose hands it may go, no matter what improvements may be put upon it, no matter how many mortgages may be given, the common-law right to declare an absolute forfeiture attaches in such a case.

Gentlemen on the other side were pleased to ask the question, as though it were an important factor in the calculation, has not a mortgage been given on this railroad? We answered yes; and gentlemen sat back as though that ended the matter. I call the attention of these gentlemen who have these scruples to the case of Farnsworth vs. The Minnesota and Pacific Railroad Company (92 United States), where it was expressly decided that the holder of mortgage securities upon a land grant to which a condition-subsequent was attached, so that possibly a declaration of forfeiture might be made, took the same subject to that liability. The court says (page 66):

"The beneficiaries under that instrument [the mortgage] took whatever security it afforded in subordination to the right of the State to enforce the forfeiture."

I could continue these quotations at great length if I had time. But this will do on that point.

Now, as to the question of policy. In his great speech on the Northern Pacific forfeiture bill, July 26, 1886, from which I have already quoted, addressing himself to this question of policy, he said:

I have shown, sir, that under the law we have the power, the legal right, to assert this forfeiture.

I said also that if this land belongs to the people nothing should constrain us to yield it to the company except the strongest equitable consideration, equities which are equal to legal obligations.

With confidence I submit that with what the House bill proposes, the liberality of its provisions in what it permits the company to retain, the facts in the history of the building of the road, and the action of the company toward the people—monopolistic, exacting, and unyielding always—I earnestly insist that to make this additional donation of one hundred millions of property would be an act of stupendous folly.

But I can not close in justice to myself without noticing the closing remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin, which I see he permits to remain in the RECORD, that these efforts on the part of the Committee on the Public Lands to restore these lands to the public domain "are the sheerest demagoguery and of the cheapest class."

This kind of talk is not new to us. We have had a good deal of it, sir, first and last, since this work began. Not only so, sir, but predictions have been freely indulged in by gentlemen who think and act as my neighbor, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE], who thinks that nothing ever could or would come of it, that no lands would ever be restored to the Government by this movement, and that it would all end in empty talk.

Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of pride to me that I have been connected in my way and to the best of my ability with these efforts to reclaim these vast areas of land from those technically holding them, but without right or equity. I was among the first in the matter, and am in the matter still, and expect to remain there.

Again, on July 2, 1884, while discussing another forfeiture bill then under consideration, the distinguished gentleman from Illinois had this to say:

I agree with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES], that this is really a pioneer case for all of these land grants which have been unearned by the railroads to whom they have been given, and I desire that the House shall make a record upon it here and now, as speedily as the roll can be called, to show whether or not the demand on the part of the people of this country that their public lands shall remain a part of the property of this great nation shall be fairly and squarely met. I believe it is their wish that these lands should be reserved on the part of the Government for the benefit of those who are homeless, for the horny-handed men of toil who are sweating day by day for a very existence. It is for us to say whether we shall take care of the trust confided to us, and keep it out of the hands of a railroad corporation that has neither justice, law, nor equity in support of its claim.

Representing the whole people of this land, as a member for the whole country as well as for the district in which I live, I should regard myself recreant to my duty if I did not protest against a donation, a free gift of this great area to a corporation which had, instead of attempting to carry out the wishes of Congress, conspicuously succeeded in defeating it. My duty I regard as done to the House. I have attempted, and I venture the hope that I have succeeded in doing so, to demonstrate that this corporation had no legal claim to any portion of this grant, for no one has yet given any authority except his own statement as against the array of citations in the report.

With the vote soon to be taken which shall determine the question whether the people shall suffer and this defaulting company be the gainer, the country must of necessity acquiesce, but I do not believe that the people whose Representatives we are will be satisfied with less than a restoration to them of that which is their own.

I am anxious that this record should be made, and plead guilty to a consuming curiosity to know how many men on this floor will dare the condemnation of this country by condoning what this company has done. What the country wants is acts, and not words; it wants results, and not promises, and I do not propose to delay it any longer.

Mr. Chairman, at this point I pause to inquire what has become of this vehement, stalwart, eloquent champion of the public right as against the claims of these great corporations? What has become of that bold warrior who strode like a "plumed knight" down yonder aisle, answering corporate insolence with brave defiance? What has become of that mighty, heroic defender of the people's cause, who was in this fight at the beginning and who swore he would remain immovable to the end? Where is he now? The great cause for which he made such splendid battle is in peril.

An empire is at stake. Where is our parliamentary Murat, the field-marshal of forfeitures? Can it be, Mr. Chairman—is it possible that the man who four short years ago denounced those who denied the legal right of Congress to declare these forfeitures as "railroad lawyers" and as people dominated by corporate influence is the same man who now sits yonder, timid, tender-footed, and oppressed with doubts? Can it be that the man who four short years ago denounced the Northern Pacific Railroad as a briber and a thief, and denounced the Senate bill as a measure intended to confirm the claim of that corporation to more than 34,000,000 of acres of land, valued at $100,000,000, and characterized it as an act of "stupendous folly" is the same man who now, with humble, apologetic voice, advocates the adoption of that very proposition?

Can it be that the man who four short years ago boldly declared over and over again that there was no shadow of doubt about our right to declare a forfeiture of these lands, and who denounced delay in and opposition to forfeiture as equal to a crime, is the same man who now seems unwilling even to submit the question in dispute to the Supreme Court and to have the law determined by the judgment of that great tribunal?

Mr. Chairman, what subtle alchemy has wrought this wonderful metamorphosis? What mellowing influence has softened this brawny chieftain who but yesterday was aflame with the fury of combat and converted him into an ally and advocate of a measure he condemned and denounced? I do not understand it; I can not comprehend it. It is all an inexplicable mystery to me.

But, gentlemen of the House, what say you to this amendment I shall propose? The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON], although he opposes the amendment, agrees that it embodies a correct principle both of law and public policy. He says he will favor it as a separate proposition, but is unwilling to make it a part of the pending bill. Why? The substance of his objection is this: That he does not believe the Senate will agree to the amendment if the House adopts it; that the Senate will not consent to any forfeiture beyond the scope of the bill the gentleman has reported.

How does the gentleman know the Senate will not agree to the amendment? True, it has steadily refused to declare a direct forfeiture of the lands covered by the amendment, but the proposition to submit the question of the forfeitability of those lands to the determination of the courts has never been considered by the Senate. The proposition to submit the whole question to the courts obviates the very objection which Senators urged against the declaration of a direct forfeiture. But, the majority say, why not send it over as a separate bill? I say why not send it over as a part of this bill? Logically and naturally, the whole question should be treated as one measure.

The amendment is germane, pertinent, proper. Why not send it over now? If the Senate disagrees to it that body can strike the amendment off and the original bill will be left as it is. The House can then determine whether it will yield the point. But I am told if that is done it means delay. That is true. Remember, however, this bill must go back to the Senate any way. There need be no great delay in any aspect of the case.

There may be no delay at all. The Senate may agree to the amendment. We ought to presume that it will agree to it rather than presume that it will not, since the proposition itself is so eminently fair and just and conservative. I am beginning recently, since both Houses have shown their hands on the silver bill and some other measures, to have a higher opinion of the integrity and usefulness of the Senate. In no event can the Senate possibly be worse than the present House of Representatives.

What if there is some delay of a month or two months or six months growing out of a conference between the two Houses? What harm will be done? Oh, the gentleman from Illinois and those acting with him say that in the mean time, during the interval of this delay, the railroad companies will go on building road and further complicate the situation. All this talk about building road is nonsense; it is a false alarm, sounded to influence your action here.

No road is being built, none is going to be built. At least no road will be constructed for the purpose of "earning" these "unearned" lands covered by the bill now under consideration. Two-thirds of the six millions and odd acres affected by that bill are worthless. The railroad companies do not want those lands. They care nothing for them. The Government would lose very little if it lost them all. But, however that may be, the companies do not want these lands and are doing nothing to earn them. Here is a letter I wish to read:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 24, 1889.

SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of the 23d instant, asking whether any of the land-grant railroads are now constructing their uncompleted lines and how many miles have been constructed by such roads during the last year.

In reply, I have to advise you that so far as known to this office none of the uncompleted land-grant railroads are now in process of construction.

The only construction of land-grant railroads during the year 1888 was 2.61 miles of the Cascade Branch of the Northern Pacific, being the tunnel at Stampede Pass in the Cascade Mountains, and its approaches.

Very respectfully,

S. M. STOCKSLAGER,
Commissioner.

Hon. W. J. STONE,
House of Representatives.

What was true in 1889, when that letter was written, is true to-day. This talk about additional construction is an old song, which has become stale and uninteresting to me.

Now, I will explain to you, in a word, why I am anxious to have this amendment I shall propose adopted and why I am opposed to sending it over to the Senate as a separate bill. My anxiety can be explained in one sentence: it is because I want that proposition brought before the Senate and acted on by that body. If the amendment shall be adopted and made a part of the pending bill, that will insure its consideration by the Senate.

But if you reject the amendment and refuse to consolidate the two propositions; if you send two bills over to the Senate instead of one, why, then, the bill reported by the gentleman from Illinois will be agreed to, but the other will probably be put to sleep in the pigeon-holes of the Senate Committee on Public Lands. I have good reason for believing that a majority of the Senate Committee on Public Lands are opposed to any sort of forfeiture beyond the "unearned" lands; but whether the Senate itself is opposed to a larger forfeiture I do not know.

I desire to put this matter in a form which will force it before the Senate. Unite the two propositions and it will go before the Senate; separate them and it will afford the Senate committee an easy opportunity to report the bill under consideration, which is what the railroads want, and to bury the other bill, to the passage of which the railroads are opposed.

Sir, if you reject the amendment I shall offer and pass the pending bill without it, that means the end of forfeiture legislation. If you pass the bill reported by the gentleman from Illinois you thereby close the books. You will restore to the public 6,180,803 acres of land, two-thirds of which is worthless; but you will, also, in effect, confirm to the corporations 48,143,193 acres of fertile and valuable lands. Why do I say you will close the books? Because, in my judgment, the bill providing for a judicial forfeiture will never come before the Senate and probably never before the House. Congress will adjourn with forfeiture legislation left where you leave it to-day.

I know there is a clause in the pending bill which provides that nothing therein shall be construed to deny or abridge the right of the United States to have further forfeitures in future if they care to take them and can get them. But that looks to me like a bait cast for fools to bite at, or a screen held up for rascals to hide behind. May have additional forfeitures! When? After we have abandoned the fight and discredited our own contention by surrender; after the Senate has had its way, and all forfeitures have been made which the Senate has ever hitherto favored; after the Interior Department has adjusted, as it will adjust, the grants on the basis of your legislation here; after the lands have been patented; after the Interior Department, the railways, and the public have adjusted their business relative to the grants on the basis of your legislation and the whole question has become a dead issue; do you then expect to have additional forfeiture legislation? Is there one here so simple as to believe that?

But after all, Mr. Chairman, this discussion is a waste of time. I have no sort of doubt that you will reject the amendment and pass this railroad bill just as it comes from the committee. It is the bill which the railroad corporations, especially the Northern Pacific, demand of you. The Speaker of the House is well known as the friend and champion of the Northern Pacific. The first of these forfeiture bills ever introduced into Congress was a bill to forfeit this Northern Pacific grant. That was in the Forty-seventh Congress.

That bill was referred to the Judiciary Committee, of which Mr. THOMAS B. REED, of Maine, was the chairman. He reported the bill back to the House with a recommendation that it do not pass. He took the ground in his report that Congress had no power to declare an absolute forfeiture, and no right whatever to take the granted lands or any part of them and restore them to the public domain. That is the most extreme view ever taken here at any time or by anybody in favor of these defaulting corporations and against the right of forfeiture.

Since the distinguished gentleman from Maine made that report in 1883 to this day he has been the recognized friend and zealous champion of that great, arrogant, and corrupt corporation on the floor of this House. These corporations know their friends and they stand by them most loyally. It is an open secret, which has been audibly whispered throughout the country, that no influence was more potential in the organization of this House than that exerted by the Northern Pacific Railroad and that system of roads with which it is associated. And that was very natural.

The passage of the bill under consideration is a matter of the first importance to these corporations. It will pass. The pins have been set with that end in view. The "bosses" must insist upon it; they can not do otherwise. And the rest of you poor fellows over there, with your hands tied and your lips silent, except when your parliamentary Joss unties the one that you may clap applause to his utterances and attunes the other that you may chant a servile chorus to the commanding tones of his majestic solos, must follow blindly wherever you are led. You are helpless.

We have almost ceased to blame you; we are fast learning to pity you. It is useless to appeal to you. This bill, infamous as it is, will go upon the statutes of the nation. We will not appeal to you. But beyond you, and beyond your parliamentary autocrat, is a great constituency—the people of the United States—and to that forum we will carry this cause which you stand ready to betray. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

During the delivery of the foregoing remarks the hammer fell.

Mr. McRAE was recognized and yielded a part of his time to Mr. STONE.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri, then resumed and concluded his remarks as above.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I will detain the committee but a very few minutes.

As a member of the Committee on the Public Lands of this House I favor the bill introduced by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] and also favor the bill that is now here before the House; but I wish to call the attention of the committee to the importance of keeping these two measures separate and distinct. The gentleman from Missouri insists that unless the bill now before the committee is made a part of his bill it will never have any chance in some other House, which other House we ought not to name here, and that it will also prevent his bill from having a proper chance in this House. His bill is reported unanimously by the Committee on the Public Lands. It provides in terms that all land grants which are now the subject of dispute between the people or the Government on the one hand and the land-grant railroads on the other shall be submitted to the courts to be there determined judicially, and the courts shall have power to declare a forfeiture in behalf of the Government and put these lands back again into the general market for occupation by the people of the country as a part of our public domain.

That is a good bill, but why should we tack upon that bill seven and a half million acres of other lands which are subject to direct forfeiture and about which there is no question or controversy? Why should his bill stand in the line of progress in the district represented by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] who has just taken his seat? Why should the bill of the gentleman stand in the way of progress in the State of Oregon, where several million acres of land are embraced in the terms of his bill? There is no question of the right to forfeit them. It is not even a question of controversy. It has not been denied that the Government has the right. The lands have not been earned. The "condition-subsequent" on which they were granted has not been complied with. The time has expired in which they could have been earned, and Congress can by a word terminate the grant and restore these seven and a half millions of acres, representing an area equal to one-fourth of the entire State of Iowa.

That is not a subject of litigation, and why should it go to the Supreme Court for settlement? Why should it be a subject of litigation at all? No good reason has been given to the House, in the hour and a half the gentleman from Missouri occupied the floor, why this land about which there is no dispute should be adjudicated in the Supreme Court of the United States in the manner that he has suggested. The Mobile and Girard grant, and a grant in Mississippi—the Ship Island grant—stand in the way of progress in the South, and those lands should also be opened. As I understand it, that is the only question before the committee, whether this bill shall stand on its own merits, its own undisputed, unquestioned merits, which restores to the public domain land which should be now open to settlement, or whether we shall tack this bill at the tail end of the 48,000,000 acres in dispute and then abide the result of litigation, which in magnitude and in duration perhaps will be the greatest ever witnessed in America.

Nothing can do more to check the progress, the growth, and settlement of a country than to throw it into chancery. You may go into this city, and I will venture to say that you can pick out every house that is in chancery by its outside appearance, by merely looking at it. I can go through my own community and pick out every quarter-section of land there that is in litigation, simply by its dilapidated condition or want of occupancy. But here is a proposition that will take 8,000,000 acres, not in litigation, which the United States has the unquestioned right to restore to the public domain, and put it in chancery. I hope it will not be done. It seems perfectly clear that the two measures should be separated and the proposition suggested by the committee ought to be supported as it has been reported to the House. There is no question in my mind that it should be adopted as an independent proposition.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will now move that the committee rise, as it is nearly 5 o'clock.

Mr. PAYSON. If no other gentleman desires to talk this evening I have no desire to prolong the session of the committee, and I move that the committee rise.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Pending that I will ask the gentleman from Illinois if it will be agreeable to the committee to allow amendments, which members have to propose, to be printed in the RECORD simply for information.

Mr. PAYSON. I have no objection.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Then I ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to printing proposed amendments in the RECORD for information only?

There was no objection.

Mr. PAYSON. I will renew the motion that the committee do now rise.

Mr. HERMANN. This does not preclude the offering of amendments to-morrow?

Mr. PAYSON. Not at all.

The motion of Mr. PAYSON was then agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PETERS reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill S. 2781, had come to no resolution thereon.

Under the general leave to print, the following amendments were handed in at the Clerk's desk:

By Mr. HOLMAN:

Strike out the first section of the substitute and insert:
"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all lands heretofore granted by Congress to any State or to any corporation to aid in the construction of a railroad or a railroad and telegraph line opposite to and continuous with the portion of any such railroad not constructed and completed within the time specified in the act making the grant for the construction and completion of the whole of such railroad are hereby declared forfeited to the United States, and the United States resumes title thereto, and all such lands so granted lying opposite to and continuous with the portion of any such railroad not constructed and completed within the time prescribed by the act of Congress making such grant for the construction and completion of the whole railroad as provided for by such act, is hereby restored to the public domain and declared to be a portion thereof: Provided, however, That the forfeiture hereby declared shall not extend to the right of way of any such railroad through the remainder of the route, including the necessary grounds for depots, switches, side-tracks, machine-shops, and turn-tables, or to lands included in any village, town, or city within the limits of the lands hereby declared forfeited."

By Mr. McRAE:

Strike out all of section 3 down to and including the word "lands," in line 21, and insert the following:

"SEC. 3. That in all cases where persons are in possession of any of the lands affected by such grant and hereby resumed by and restored to the United States under deed, written contract with, or license from the corporation for whose benefit said grant was made, or its bona fide assignees, for a valuable consideration executed in good faith prior to the 1st day of January, A. D. 1890, they shall be entitled to purchase the same from the United States, in quantities not exceeding 320 acres to any one such person at the rate of $1.25 per acre at any time within two years from the passage of this act, and on making requisite proofs and payments to receive patents therefor; and where any such person in possession of any such lands under deed, written contract, or license as aforesaid, or his assignor, has made partial or full payments to said railroad company prior to the 1st day of January, 1890, on account of the purchase price of said lands from it, on proof of the amount of such payments he shall be entitled to have the same, to the extent and amount of $1.25 per acre, if so much has been paid, and not more, credited to him on account of and as part of the purchase price herein provided to be paid the United States for said lands, or such persons may elect to abandon their purchases and make claim on said lands under the homestead law and as provided in the preceding section of this act: Provided, That in all cases where parties, persons, or corporations, with the permission of said railroad company or its assignees, are in the possession of, and have made improvements upon, any of the lands hereby resumed and restored, and are not entitled to enter the same under the provisions of this act, such parties, persons, or corporations shall have six months in which to remove any growing crop, and within which time they shall also be entitled to remove all buildings and other movable improvements from said lands: Provided further, That a mortgage or pledge of any of said lands shall not be considered a sale for the purposes of this section."

By Mr. STONE, of Missouri:

Amend by adding the following sections to the bill:

"SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the Attorney-General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed, as speedily as possible after the passage of this act, to institute suit or suits, at law or in equity, in the name of the United States, in the circuit court of the United States having jurisdiction, against any person, corporation, or association of persons claiming to own under or through the grant of Congress any lands heretofore granted by Congress to any State or to any corporation to aid in the construction of a railroad or a railroad and telegraph line, where any such lands so claimed lie opposite to or contiguous with any constructed part of any such railroad which was not constructed and completed within the time specified in the granting act or acts for the construction and completion of the whole railroad, to determine whether any such granted lands so claimed by any such person, corporation, or association of persons are subject and liable under the law to be forfeited and reclaimed by the United States on account of the non-construction of such part of any such railroad in accordance with the requirements of the granting act or acts, and to obtain and recover judgments declaring forfeited to the United States all of such lands as are opposite to and contiguous with such constructed part or parts of either of said railroads which were not constructed within the period fixed in the granting act or acts for the completion of the whole road or otherwise in accordance with the requirements of the granting acts, and setting aside any patents which have issued for any such lands: Provided, however, That no judgment of forfeiture shall extend to the right of way of any such railroad, or to the necessary grounds for depots, switches, side-tracks, machine-shops, and turn-tables, or to lands included in any village, town, or city within the limits of any such granted lands."

"SEC. 9. That in bringing and prosecuting the suits provided for in the next preceding section the Attorney-General shall treat each grant of lands coming within the provisions of said section separately, and in each case shall institute suit in that circuit court of the United States within the jurisdiction of which the lands affected thereby, or any part thereof, may lie: Provided, That where the lands affected by any suit may lie within the jurisdiction of more than one circuit court suit may be brought in either of such courts for the forfeiture of the whole of such lands."

"Any person or corporation claiming any interest in the lands to be affected by said suit or suits, and whether made a party thereto or not, may intervene therein by sworn petition to defend his interest therein, and may, upon such petition for intervention, also put in issue and have adjudicated and determined any other question, whether of law or fact, which may be in dispute between said intervenor and the United States, or between themselves, and affecting the right or title, predicated on the grant of the United States, to any part of the lands embraced in any such suit."

"Appeals or writs of error may be prosecuted to the Supreme Court as in other cases from the judgment or decree of any circuit court rendered under the provisions of this act, and in all cases where any such judgment or decree shall be adverse to the United States the Attorney-General shall prosecute an appeal or writ of error to the Supreme Court; and in all without regard to the value of the lands affected thereby; and any suit brought under the provisions of this act shall be advanced to hearing in preference to all other civil cases on the dockets of the circuit or supreme courts: Provided, That no judgment or decree of any circuit court rendered under the provisions of this act shall be considered final within the meaning of this act in cases where an appeal or writ of error is prosecuted therefrom."

"And in all cases where any final judgment shall be rendered by any circuit court or the Supreme Court under the provisions of this act, declaring any lands forfeited to the United States, such lands shall thereafter be and become a part of the public domain, any withdrawals heretofore made to the contrary notwithstanding, except as may be herein otherwise provided."

"SEC. 10. That in all cases where any lands affected by any final judgment or decree of any circuit court or of the Supreme Court, rendered under the provisions of this act, have been, prior to January 1, 1888, sold and conveyed by deed or written contract by any State or corporation to which any such grant was made, or by any corporation owning any railroad for the benefit of which any such grant was made to any person, such lands, in quantities not exceeding 320 acres to any one person, shall be exempt from the operation, force, and effect of any such judgment or decree, and the title to any such lands, to the extent herein limited to any one person, is hereby confirmed to the purchaser, his heirs or assigns: Provided, That if any one person shall claim to own more than 320 acres of any such lands under and by virtue of any such sale and conveyance made by any such State or corporation to him or her as an original purchaser, in good faith and for a valuable consideration, or who shall claim by mesne conveyance from such original purchaser, such person may, within one year from the passage of this act, make and file before the register and receiver of the proper land office, subject to an appeal to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, proof of the good faith, consideration, date, and extent of his or her purchase; and if after hearing the proof and investigating the case the register and receiver shall determine that the purchase was made in good faith and for a valuable consideration, prior to January 1, 1888, then, in that case, the register and receiver shall note the finding on the records of the local land office, and thereafter certify the same to the Commissioner of the General Land Office. If the finding and decision of the register and receiver be adverse to the purchaser he may, within six months thereafter, under such rules as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, appeal to the Commissioner of the General Land Office."

"Whenever any case shall be certified or appealed to the Commissioner of the General Land Office under the provisions of this section, he shall carefully examine the same, and approve or disapprove the finding and decision of the register and receiver therein. Any person aggrieved by the action of the Commissioner of the General Land Office may appeal to the Secretary of the Interior."

"Whenever the Commissioner of the General Land Office, or the Secretary of the Interior in case of appeal, shall determine that any purchase was in fact made in good faith and for a valuable consideration prior to January 1, 1888, the purchaser, if then a citizen of the United States or having in due form of law declared his or her intention of becoming such, shall be entitled to purchase from the United States the said lands claimed by him or her in excess of the 320 acres hereby confirmed to him or her, at the rate of $1.25 per acre, at any time within two years after the decision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office or the Secretary of the Interior has been rendered: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to confirm any such purchases of land upon which there were prior bona fide pre-emption or homestead claims subsisting on the 1st day of January, 1888, arising or asserted under color of the laws of the United States: Provided further, That a mortgage or pledge of any of said lands shall not be considered a sale for the purposes of this section."

"SEC. 11. That all bona fide settlers upon any of the lands which may be declared forfeited by any final judgment of the Supreme Court or any circuit court under the provisions of this act are hereby permitted and authorized to acquire title to not exceeding 160 acres in each case, as a homestead, under and pursuant to the laws relating thereto, and in making final proof of such homestead the settler shall be allowed for the time he has already resided upon and cultivated the same, and if such settler is not entitled to the benefits of the homestead law he or she shall have the prior right to enter the tract settled on, not exceeding 160 acres, at $1.25 per acre."

"SEC. 12. That no lands declared forfeited to the United States by this act, or by any judgment of the Supreme Court under the provisions of this act, shall inure to the benefit of any State or corporation to which lands may have been granted by Congress; nor shall this act be construed to enlarge the area of lands originally covered by any such grant."

"SEC. 13. That the price of the even sections of the public lands not reserved within the limits of the several grants heretofore made is hereby fixed at $1.25 per acre."

By Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas:

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the following bills:

A bill (H. R. 982) to provide for the admission of the State of Wyoming into the Union, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 5966) to provide for an additional associate justice of the supreme court of the Territory of New Mexico;

A bill (H. R. 8245) to provide for the disposal of the abandoned military reservations in Wyoming Territory; and

A bill (H. R. 9104) granting to the Jacksonville, St. Augustine and Halifax River Railway Company a right of way across the United States military reservation at St. Augustine, Fla.

LAND COURT.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President—
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator rise to morning business?

Mr. SHERMAN. I rise to call up a privileged report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wanted to get up the land-court bill first.

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield for a moment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1042, that was up yesterday morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar under Rule VIII being in order, the Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1042) to establish a United States land court, and to provide for the settlement of private land claims in certain States and Territories.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

TREASURY NOTES AND SILVER BULLION.

Mr. SHERMAN. Pending that order, I call up the conference report on the silver bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. 5381) directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes. The report of the committee has been read at length. The question is on concurring in the report.

Mr. VEST. I want to state, sir, very briefly the reasons why I shall not vote for the bill reported by the committee of conference.

A large majority of the Senate declared in favor of the free coinage of silver. We have now a conference report which absolutely gives away all idea of free coinage, and in my judgment continues, and is intended to continue, the system under which silver has been persistently and consistently degraded since 1873. There will be no contradiction of the assertion from any intelligent source that the Treasury Department has been governed by the principle and upon the idea that until silver came to a parity with gold, silver should not be paid out upon the bonded indebtedness of the United States. So often in the debate has evidence been given of the hostility of the Treasury Department under both Democratic and Republican Administrations to the paying out of silver, as of gold, to the public creditors, that it would be simply a senseless repetition to go through that evidence again.

Mr. President, I, as much as any Senator here, am anxious to see an absolute parity between the two metals as money metals. I should like to see the time in this country when 16 ounces of silver will purchase an ounce of gold, and an ounce of gold continue as at present to purchase 16 ounces of silver. But, I repeat, the idea which has governed the gold party and the Treasury of the United States through all the past years since this struggle commenced has been that until silver came to a parity with gold it should not be paid out to the public creditors.

I assert here now, as I asserted in the debate out of which has come this conference report, that so long as the Government of the United States by legislation and the action of its public officials makes a discrimination between the two money metals, so long will silver continue to trail behind gold and gold will govern the price and value of silver.

Now, I call attention to the concluding part of section 2 of this conference bill:

It being the established policy of the United States to maintain the two metals on a parity with each other upon the present legal ratio, or such ratio as may be provided by law.

Why was that declaration put in this report? Why was that stump speech injected into the stomach of this bill? It was done, as we all know, for the purpose of saying to the Treasury Department, "Until silver comes to a parity with gold you shall pay out gold, and the public business of the country shall be conducted upon a gold basis." I, for one, will never vote to maintain and continue that idea and that practice in the monetary affairs of the country.

I was under the impression, sir, that the whole struggle was upon the idea that free coinage, with fair play to gold and silver, without discrimination against one and in favor of the other, should prevail, and that the Senate so voted; and here we have a report which absolutely does away with that idea and puts us back to the old régime under which silver has continually gone down and has been supplanted by gold exclusively.

Again, sir, I never was a silver man in order to furnish a market for the silver miners of the West. I am against that bounty and that subsidy to silver mines as I would be against one to ships, or wheat, or corn, or any other commodity in this country at the expense of the interests of the rest of the people. It may be that this bill will give a market to silver and to the men who mine it, but the principle for which we fought, that the two metals should be alike, that they should have the same free and open play in order to determine their value, has been given away in this report absolutely and completely, in my judgment.

But there is another objection to this bill, and if there were no other I would not vote for it. The first section of the bill has language in it never found before in any similar measure in regard to silver:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to purchase from time to time silver bullion to the aggregate amount of 4,500,000 ounces, or so much thereof as may be offered, in each month, at the market price thereof, not exceeding $1 for 371.25 grains of pure silver.

I call the attention of the friends of silver to this remarkable language. The Secretary of the Treasury is directed to purchase 4,500,000 ounces at the market price when offered. No such language has ever been found in any silver bill before. The Bland bill, which was a tentative measure, which did not satisfy the demands of the country or the friends of silver, but was the best that could be obtained at the time, was mandatory, and directed the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase silver, and he was obliged to do it, in quantities not less than $2,000,000 worth a month. But here is a direction to him to purchase at the market price "when offered." Who makes that market price? Who is to be the judge of it? It is left to the nebulous and uncertain discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, and we know what that means. We know from the past, from the influences that have controlled the Treasury Department, what will be done. It is useless to tell us this bill will be carried out in any other way than past legislation has been carried out, in the interest of gold and against silver.

Sir, for these reasons I shall not vote for this conference report.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, I desire to express my concurrence in the conclusions of the Senator from Missouri. I can not support this bill as presented by the conference committee. We have now under a law which has existed since 1878 a provision for the compulsory coinage of silver. It is the coinage of silver that imparts to that metal its money power. Not less than $2,000,000 must be coined monthly under existing law. Under this bill, on the 1st day of July, 1891, it is left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury whether another dollar of silver shall be coined or not, and the Secretary of the Treasury has told us in advance that another dollar of silver should not be coined.

The conferees on the part of the Senate in agreeing to this bill have not represented the opinions of the Senate of the United States, which were for free and unlimited coinage of silver. On the contrary, they have assented to a bill which provides definitely for the cessation of the further coinage of silver at all. The bill as presented is another step in the demonetization of silver. Who does not know that to leave it to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury whether silver shall be coined or not is equal to stopping the coinage of that metal? That is a fact well known, and was admitted throughout the recent debate on this subject. I am opposed, Mr. President, to buying one single ounce of silver that is not to be coined. I am opposed to the United States Government going into the warehouse business for silver or for any other product. If we are not to coin silver, why purchase it? If this bill is to advance the money power of silver, why cease the coinage of silver, which operation alone confers upon it the power of money?

The House of Representatives once passed a free-coinage bill. The Senate of the United States again has passed a free-coinage bill. This good day two-thirds of the people of these United States are in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of silver; yet this admitted majority in favor of free coinage is balked at every turn by the Executive and the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States when the popular will is sought to be put into effect. Every President, every Secretary of the Treasury that we have had since 1873 has in every way—I do not except the Democratic President and Secretary at all, because they were as extreme as any Republicans could have been—have done everything they could possibly do to break down silver. Instead of commending it to the confidence of the world, they have done everything that lay in their power to undermine and destroy it, and yet they tell us that they are in favor of a bimetallic currency. Does this bill provide for a bimetallic currency? Look at the provision with reference to silver certificates, that they—shall be a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract.

They invite the people of the country to add their efforts to those of the Government in the degradation and debasement of silver. If the bullion certificates are to be legal-tender notes, why not make them so? Why not make the law for one the law for all? If we are to have silver currency, are we to get it by stopping the coinage of silver and saying to the people, "You can take these certificates in the payment of debts or not, as you please?" Is that the way to build up silver? Is that the way to produce a parity between silver and gold? This bill is contradictory on its face. It says in section 2 that these silver certificates to be issued for silver bullion shall be redeemable in gold or silver coin. In section 3 it says:

That the Secretary of the Treasury shall each month coin 2,000,000 ounces of the silver bullion purchased under the provisions of this act into standard silver dollars until the 1st day of July, 1891, and after that time he shall coin of the silver bullion purchased under the provisions of this act as much as may be necessary to provide for the redemption of the Treasury notes herein provided for.

Are these gold or silver certificates? Is not that a direction to the Secretary of the Treasury? Will he ever redeem a certificate in gold issued for the purchase of this silver bullion? If he does he will violate this law.

It does seem to me, Mr. President, that it is time that the will of the people of this country was being obeyed. Through their House of Representatives they have demanded free coinage. Through the Senate they have demanded free coinage. There has never at any time heretofore been so strong a sentiment as there is to-day in favor of the free coinage of silver; and yet we see the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury interposing a barrier to the attainment of the popular will, and we see the Senate given away in this conference with the House upon this question, and, after it has declared for free coinage, made to assent to a proposition which amounts to a cessation of the little coinage we now have in July, 1891.

So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, I propose to vote against this bill. I prefer the law as it now exists. That law is mandatory on the Secretary of the Treasury. I prefer it as it now exists, and I say to gentlemen who favor silver coinage if they will but reject this bill and stand by the law as it now is, if they can not get something better than this, they have only to wait until another election and the people are heard from again before they will see the men who are standing between the people and their will scourged into submission and free coinage established.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I do not intend by any remarks made on the floor of the Senate to-day to be tempted to enter into the silver debate. We certainly have had enough of that before. Each Senator had then a right to express his opinions, and no doubt his opinions have not been changed by subsequent events. I consider it my duty, however, to state what has been done by the committee of conference in performing the very difficult task imposed upon them by the Senate and the House of Representatives.

The House of Representatives after full consideration sent to us a bill, printed in this document precisely as it was passed by the House. It came to the Senate.

The Senate ingrafted upon it the principle of free coinage, together with some other provisions, changing the character of the House bill. Indeed, the Senate made a substitute for the House bill, embodying no part of the House bill except a single section relating to the national banks. In this condition the two bills went before the committee of conference. The House of Representatives had by a decided vote, which I need not repeat, determined against the free coinage of silver, and the question then arose whether the two Houses could be brought to an agreement upon a proposition based upon both bills, embodying both, but omitting the free coinage of silver. That was the problem to be solved.

Now, what did we do? In the first section of the bill proposed by the conference committee we have changed somewhat the language of the first section of the House bill; we have increased the amount of silver to be purchased. We have placed, much to my regret I must confess, in this bill a larger amount than the entire production of American silver. We have made it mandatory, not permissive, but mandatory, upon the Secretary of the Treasury to buy four and a half million ounces of silver, which, at the full price that the friends of this bill believe it will attain, will purchase in a year something like $69,000,000 worth of silver bullion and will cause the issue of $69,000,000 of Treasury notes per annum. Four and a half million ounces per month are to be bought. If each ounce is worth $1.29, the price at the ratio of 16 to 1, it will cause the issue of Treasury notes to the amount of something like $70,000,000 a year. The precise figures I can not now give.

The majority of the Senate conferees insisted upon that because that was the limit that those who were in favor of free coinage sought to apply and demanded, and the House conferees with great reluctance yielded that point. The House had proposed the purchase of four and a half million dollars' worth per month, which would be a considerably less sum. That was finally yielded.

Now, in respect to the words "the market price thereof," that language is in every bill that ever authorized the Secretary of the Treasury or any other officer to buy anything. As a matter of course, the market price, not the fictitious value, is the only basis of the purchase. Those words are contained in the present Bland law and in every law on the subject. But it was said with a great deal of force that as we propose now to buy more than the entire production of domestic silver, the Secretary should not be required to purchase unless the silver was offered to him, and that limitation (although I believe it is scarcely a limitation at all) was applied that he should not be bound to purchase that which was not offered, and that, I understand, is the point my friend from Texas [Mr. COKE] is troubled about. The rest of that section, I believe, is substantially like the House bill as sent to us.

Now, as to the second section, the legal-tender clause in the House bill, the Senate bill was somewhat different but somewhat alike also. The legal-tender clause of the Senate bill is as follows:

Shall be a legal tender for the payment of all debts, public and private.

Then the question came up whether that would prevent a man making a contract payable in wheat, in corn, or in whisky, or for the delivery of any other property, or whether if a contract was made payable in gold, as in many portions of the country contracts are so made, a citizen of the United States should be deprived of the right to contract for whatever he chooses between himself and other parties. Besides that, we found that the silver dollar had the same limitation that was applied here. The silver dollar under the Bland law is not a legal tender where the contract expressly stipulates that some other mode of payment shall be made.

We therefore agreed nem. con. that we would not give to this Treasury note issued for this silver a higher attribute as a legal tender than the silver dollar upon which it was based, and you will find in the Bland law this clause, "except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract." We took from that law as it has now stood for twelve years this provision and applied it to the legal-tender clause, relating to the Treasury notes, and that would be the law which would be applied by the courts even without such a stipulation. But in order to make it clear, so that the people would see the exact nature of these Treasury notes, these words were copied from the Bland act, "except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract."

It was absolutely necessary, at any rate, to make this stipulation where the Government has promised to pay gold, as in the gold certificates. This provision is based on the broad principle that where two persons agree upon the mode of payment, it would be an outrage and a wrong and a denial of the right to make a contract for us to say that the payment should be made in something or other not provided for in the contract.

Now, as to the last clause of this second section, it was said that the House of Representatives attached great importance to what is called bullion redemption; that is, that the Secretary of the Treasury might, if a stringency should come upon him, pay off these Treasury notes, the silver certificates, as they were called in the House bill, in silver bullion held in the Treasury. Suppose at a time it might be absolutely necessary, when he had no other means at hand, when there was no surplus money—

Mr. TELLER. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Ohio that there was nothing in the House bill of that character.

Mr. SHERMAN. I mean in the House bill.

Mr. TELLER. There is nothing in the House bill that came here which authorized the Secretary in a stress to pay out silver bullion. He could only do it when he and the holder agreed.

Mr. SHERMAN. When it was demanded by the holder he might then pay it out. That was insisted upon.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator must see that that could not be valuable to the Department in case of difficulty, when the Secretary was out of money.

Mr. SHERMAN. This was the proviso insisted upon strongly by the House conferees:

Provided, That upon demand of the holder of any of the Treasury notes herein provided for the Secretary of the Treasury may, at his discretion and under such regulations as he shall prescribe, exchange for such notes an amount of silver bullion which shall be equal in value at the market price thereof on the day of exchange to the amount of such notes presented.

The House conferees finally yielded upon the Senate conferees proposing the following as a substitute, which is a declaration of public policy to abandon this mode of redemption:

That upon demand of the holder of any of the Treasury notes herein provided for the Secretary of the Treasury shall, under such regulations as he may prescribe, redeem such notes in gold or silver coin, at his discretion, it being the established policy of the United States to maintain the two metals on a parity with each other upon the present legal ratio, or such ratio as may be provided by law.

This declaration of public policy has been announced from the beginning of the Government to this hour. There never has been a time when this proposition would not have received the sanction of both Houses of Congress. Hamilton and Jefferson acting together agreed upon the bimetallic standard, upon the coinage of the two metals, upon the parity of the two metals, and they sought to ascertain that parity by a long and careful examination. So from time to time all our legislation has pointed in that direction, to maintain the parity of the two metals; and the House conferees being satisfied with the declaration of this policy abandoned the clause that they had insisted upon, and this was adopted.

Then another difficulty arose. It was said that as the present silver certificates represented all the silver dollars now in the Treasury, there was no mode by which the Secretary of the Treasury could pay these notes if payment was demanded. It was supposed that in all probability it would not be demanded; but that was not a sufficient answer, because the law itself contemplated that a demand might be made for the redemption of these notes. Therefore, the committee provided that the present coinage of 2,000,000 of ounces, and they made it ounces instead of $2,000,000 worth, 2,000,000 ounces should be coined for one year so that the Secretary might have a fund of about $30,000,000 on hand available for this purpose, with the power and direction to coin more, if necessary, out of the silver bullion in hand.

That is the provision in the third section authorizing the continued coinage under the present law of 2,000,000 ounces.

That is all there is in the bill, as I believe, which changes any of the terms.

The fourth and fifth sections are taken from both the Senate and House bills. The sixth section is precisely what was adopted by both Houses in respect to national-bank funds.

Mr. VEST. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. I understood him, although there was some conversation around me at the time and I may have misunderstood him, to assert that the language of the first section was identical with the language of the first section in the Bland bill, the previous silver legislation.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, I do not say that. I said that the language "at the market price thereof" is precisely the same. The additional words "when offered," I stated were agreed to in conference.

Mr. VEST. I am a little curious to know on the motion of which set of conferees those words were put in, the House or the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should have no objection to telling, except that it is against the express rule to do so.

Mr. VEST. The Senator was stating that the House demanded—

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator might be surprised at the answer if I were to answer the question.

Mr. VEST. I am willing to be surprised.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not desire on the conference report to go into particulars. If there is any point of this bill that any Senator desires information about I will try to give it to him, so far as the rules of the Senate allow.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to ask in regard to the phrase "or so much thereof as may be offered in each month, at the market price thereof."

Mr. SHERMAN. I have already stated about that. If it is not offered, as a matter of course the Secretary can not buy it.

Mr. STEWART. I should like the views of the Senator from Ohio as to whether it would be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury under the language used in the bill to buy four and a half million ounces per month if that amount were offered, or could he decline to buy on the pretext that it was not offered in this country at the market price in London? Could the Secretary of the Treasury depress the price of silver by refusing to buy unless he could get offers at the London price?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt the Secretary of the Treasury, under the gravest responsibilities and gravest obligations to obey this law rigidly, would not allow himself any doubtful construction. He would go on and buy, whatever might be the results to him or to anybody, four and one-half million ounces a month. We can not legislate upon the idea that the officers of the law will disregard the law or evade it or avoid it. If I thought so I would want to abolish the office of the Secretary of the Treasury. The eye of any man holding that position would be keenly set upon the language of the law and a fair construction of the law, and it is not to be assumed that he will avoid or evade the duty imposed upon him, whether he approve it or not. I have not the slightest doubt that the present Secretary of the Treasury or any other Secretary, whatever may be his party creed, would obey the law; and if not, he ought not to be there a moment, and he would be liable to impeachment if he disobeyed the law.

Mr. STEWART. I merely want to get the Senator's idea. The Senator then does not think there can be any danger of the Secretary's failing to buy four and a half million ounces of silver a month if he can get it for less than par as provided in this act?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not the slightest doubt of that. You can not legislate upon the idea that the officers will not execute the law.

The Senator from Missouri referred to the President and the Secretary of the Treasury as if they had been surrounding this Capitol. Why, sir, I have not seen, and I do not think a single conferee has seen the President of the United States or the Secretary of the Treasury during this whole conference. I have no idea and no more knowledge of what the President wants, or will do or desires to be done in regard to this matter, and I would not feel at liberty to go near him while this matter was pending, especially when I was on committee of conference, and, so far as I know, neither of these gentlemen ever appeared before any member of the committee of conference.

Mr. VEST. The Senator is mistaken as to a matter of fact. I did not make any statement to that effect.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE], perhaps.

Mr. VEST. I have my private impression as to what the President and Secretary are doing.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no knowledge. As a matter of course, we all know the President of the United States well enough to know that he will do what he thinks is his bounden duty under his obligation. As to his influencing me or seeking to influence me in a matter of this kind, it is entirely beyond the bounds of reason.

Mr. HAWLEY. I would remind the Senator that there is a general instruction to the Administration in the eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth lines of section 2, on page 12.

It being the established policy of the United States to maintain the two metals on a parity with each other.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have already alluded to that.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, in the practice of my profession I always dread a packed jury. I always am reluctant to go into a court where I know the mind of the court is made up against me to try a case by a jury, a majority of whom I know are adverse to my client.

The trouble about this bill is not as to whether a Secretary will obey the law where the law is made explicit, clear, and mandatory, but there is not a single section in this conference report or in the bill that has been reported by the conference committee but what has a discretion given to the Secretary of the Treasury who is "packed" against silver.

That is my dread about this bill, and one of the strong reasons why I shall not vote for it. There is not a single section that does not convey and have in it a discretion to the Secretary of the Treasury by which he can destroy, dishonor, and degrade silver as money; and the best evidence that that is the purpose of this bill is to be found in the advocates of it and the advocates of these powers thus given to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Sir, I do not seek to reflect upon the present Secretary of the Treasury—far from it. The Treasury Department has been packed against silver ever since I have been a member of this body—not merely your party on that side of the Chamber, but my own, until I am weary of it.

Thirteen years ago when I took my seat in this body I announced my adherence to the free coinage of silver, and I have had no reason at a single moment since to change my mind upon that subject. I represent in part one of the strongest Commonwealths so far as its business is concerned that exists beneath the flag, and I say here to Senators that there are not a thousand men in the State of Indiana (except such as desire favors at the hands of this Administration which is adverse to the free coinage of silver) who would not vote to-day for its free coinage.

What is the spectacle presented here in this body? I am amazed at Senators. I will not use offensive language, but I am amazed at the hardihood of Senators who stand up in this body to take back all we said and all we did and all we voted for within the last three or four weeks. Seventeen majority of the Senate of the United States is treated as chaff—one-fifth of this body was embodied in a majority on this subject—seventeen majority for the free coinage of silver, and the representatives of this body on the conference committee have treated that expression as idle, and it is to go for naught!

My word for it, the American people, those who labor, those who toil, those who delve, those who sow, those who reap and mow, will not consider this action on the part of the Senate a few weeks ago as idle or as not binding. I think I know better why the people of this country in their trouble and distress lifted up their heads and looked this way, and they breathed a little freer when they saw that the Senate of the United States, that body so often spoken of and derided for its conservatism and its want of progress, had gone so far on a measure of relief for the laboring people. They rejoiced at it, and in the last three weeks, while this measure has been pending in the committee of conference bound up in doubt, more expressions in the way of petitions, and letters, and the like have reached here than even during the discussion that was on.

I repeat, sir, that something was done which can not be taken back; and if the men who compose the majority of this body for free silver and free coinage the same as gold, the same as it was when our fathers expanded this country, and the same as it was before the fraud and treachery that destroyed it in 1873, are willing to undo their work and vote that that majority is null and void, I shall be utterly astounded; I shall be utterly amazed.

Ah, sir, some one says there is something gained by the monthly purchase of 4,500,000 ounces of silver. Yes, sir, at a market price which can be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, to the extent that it may be offered upon the market.

These notes are to be redeemed in gold or silver according to the discretion of the Secretary, leaving him the power to discriminate against silver and degrade and disgrace it; and other discretions could be pointed out which I will not take the time to do, but I say here to the owners of silver mines, I say to the Senators from silver States, that I am not here for the purpose of making a market for your commodity; I am not here for the purpose of selling the products of your mines; I am here in behalf of the dignity of the dollar of the fathers; I am here in behalf of silver as money, not as a salable or purchasable commodity.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana how he would have those notes redeemable, by specifying one metal or giving the option to the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem in either?

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. Would the Senator like to have them redeemable solely in silver or solely in gold?

Mr. VOORHEES. I will answer you. I know the Senator's real mind. He believes that the silver dollar is as good as the gold dollar, and that it ought to be so, and so recognized; and that being the case, let me ask him why should there be any discretion left to the Secretary which he will pay out? Let him pay both; let him pay either. It is money that he is to pay. It makes no difference, if one is as good as the other, whether he pays with a gold or a silver dollar.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. In order to pay both or either he must have the discretion which this bill gives him.

Mr. VOORHEES. I thought it would be long before I would come in conflict with the honorable Senator from Nevada. I learned my lesson when I first entered this body under his teaching in behalf of the silver dollar. If he has changed his views I have not changed mine. If he has other views, I have the same that I have had for years, and with which I will go back to the people who have honored me with a seat in this body.

Mr. President, it was well pointed out by the able Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] that after July, 1891, there is no compulsion in this bill to coin any silver. Let me read a little and see what this discretion looks like. Section 3 says—

That the Secretary of the Treasury shall each month coin 2,000,000 ounces of the silver bullion purchased under the provisions of this act into standard silver dollars until the 1st day of July, 1891, and after that time he shall coin of the silver bullion purchased under the provisions of this act as much as may be necessary.

For some purpose that he is to carry out, "as much as may be necessary," and he is to be the judge in the matter, of course. There is a discretion after July 1, 1891, where silver can be discriminated against.

Mr. President, I will not say that this bill is a cheat, I will not say it is a fraud, because of the presence I am in, but under its malign influences I will say that silver instead of reviving as a currency, instead of being more potent as a factor for the people's prosperity, will wither, shrink back, and take its place as a miserable commodity instead of being clothed with the dignity of money.

Sir, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] was inaccurate in another statement. He said this bill had passed the House of Representatives after full consideration. I deny it; I utterly deny it. I assert here that if the bill had had free way without the tyranny of existing circumstances, 40 majority would have marked the passage of a free-coinage measure in the House of Representatives. The people are behind the measure, and when they are you will generally find members of Congress going for it. If the Senators here who represent little States on the Atlantic coast, whose constituents are interested in the scarcity of money so that their investments may be more valuable and the purchasing power of money great over property and labor, think there is hostility in the great mind of the American people to the free coinage of silver, they are mistaken. Let them cross the Alleghanies and go into the great valleys of the West; go into the great laboring and mining regions of this country up in Wisconsin and everywhere else, and you will find that the people who produce the greatness of this country by labor are in favor of a free-coinage measure.

I deny that it has had full consideration in the other House. It did have full consideration in this body. I took but little part in it. I saw that everything was going on well, and I rejoiced when 17 majority pronounced in favor of the free coinage of silver, and it is a day of shame and degradation, in my judgment, when that majority is wiped out by the report of the committee of conference, and the Senate is asked to recede, to retrograde, to go back, to leave the whole question to the hostile Treasury Department, to see what will become of it.

I shall not vote for this bill. I shall vote for no such bill, unless it should be as a choice of evils. I was going to say that I would vote for no bill except one for the free coinage of silver. I will vote for any bill that betters the present law; but I agree with the Senator from Texas that this is not an improvement upon the present law. On the contrary, it makes the situation more vague, more uncertain, leaves the Secretary more discretion, and consequently involves the people's interests in more doubt.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question upon agreeing to the report of the committee of conference?

Mr. VEST. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not intend to detain the Senate at any great length upon this conference report. I realize full well and my experience as a member of this body has taught me that in most cases legislation proceeds upon a compromise, and my experience has also shown me that in a great majority of cases compromises are unsatisfactory to both sides, and I have not much doubt that if this conference report is accepted and this bill becomes a law, we shall find that it is not entirely what we supposed it would be, and perhaps not what either side expected it would be.

Mr. President, the silver question has been very thoroughly discussed. It has been discussed here, been discussed in the public press, and I agree with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], who has just taken his seat, that these are about the only places where it has been discussed. I am restrained by the courtesies that are due to another body from expressing my opinion, which I would gladly do were it proper for me to do so, with reference to the course of another branch of the Legislature in reference to this question. I do not believe I shall depart from the usual courtesy and go beyond the proprieties of this place if I say that in my judgment nothing done with reference to this bill in that House redounds to the honor of the American name.

I shall not exceed, I think, the proprieties of debate when I say that what has been considered the representative body of the American people absolutely flouted in the face of the American people the demand made upon them by Wall street, disregarding in every way the public sentiment of their constituents, for I agree with the Senator from Texas that two-thirds of the American people to-day are in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of silver, and I predict here now, whether I shall be a member of the Fifty-second Congress or not, that there will be a majority in the next House of Representatives in favor of the free coinage of silver, and there will be a bigger representative vote in this body in favor of the free coinage of silver in the Fifty-second Congress than there has been in this; not simply because we shall add two new States with four more Senators, but because I believe we have reached a position in American affairs when the American people propose to be heard upon this financial question, when the American people, the men who toil in mills, and in machine-shops, and in mines, and on farms, and in counting-houses, propose to take some hand in the legislation which concerns them so much as the legislation touching money does in this country.

Mr. President, the debate in this body has I think been conducted with reasonable feeling on both sides, with reasonable temper, considering the importance of the subject discussed. It has not been so discussed in the public press. We have been derided. We men who have been in favor of continuing a policy that originated with the very origin of the Government, the maintenance of the bimetallic system, have been derided and calumniated and slandered, not only in the public press, but in another branch of the legislative department. We have been told that this legislation was born of a desire to get cheap money. We have been told that its principal advocates were those only who were interested in the production of silver.

Mr. President, the people of the State that I in part represent produce more silver than any other community in the world. I would like to inquire of somebody if it is a disgrace to produce that which has been from the dawn of civilization the mainstay and the hope of commerce, the mainstay and the hope of civilization. I want to know whether the men who produce silver are not as good and have not the same right to present their interests here as the men who produce iron, or woolen goods, or anything else.

Mr. President, the men who produce silver do not rob anybody. They do not steal anything that belongs to anybody else. When the hardy miner comes out of the pit at night, if he has put in circulation an ounce more of silver or a fraction of an ounce more of gold than was in circulation before, has added to the wealth of the world, and he has taken nothing from anybody else. And so, Mr. President, if I had made extended arguments in defense of silver, I should have done what my brother Senators have done in the best interest of their States. I have said here, and I repeat again, that I have not been moved in this matter with reference specially to increasing the value of the product of my State because it is produced within the boundaries of my State.

I have been in favor of giving it an enhanced value because it is an American production. I have been in favor of it principally, however, because its enhanced price insures and secures, not only to the people of this country, but of all the world, its use as a money metal; and so I have taken the time of the Senate on more than one occasion to speak in defense of this interest, not, I repeat, because it was the interest of Colorado alone, but because it was the interest of all the people of the United States and all the people of the world.

In another place when this matter was under discussion briefly, trammelled, obstructed, and hindered, where there was no fair expression of opinion, where there was no opportunity to put the bill in proper shape, where there was denied, arbitrarily and illegally as it seems to me, the opportunity to make amendments, it was said that there had been around the Senate and around the House during the past winter an extensive lobby in the interest of silver. I deny it. I assert here that there has been no lobby about the Senate nor about the House in favor of silver. Last fall the people of the United States, without reference to party, assembled in the city of St. Louis in the interest of the use of silver as money.

The State of Colorado and all the other mining States were represented, and I believe I am stating the exact facts when I say that every State in the Union had there its representative. In that convention a committee was appointed to look after legislation, a proceeding that was perfectly proper in accordance with American methods and American ideas. The distinguished president of that association, long a member of the other House, and two distinguished men who are connected with the mining interests of the West, appeared here as the representatives of that body and expressed their views upon this subject, and aside from that I affirm that there has been nobody here in the interest of silver that can be considered a lobby or a lobbyist at all.

Was there any impropriety in the president of that association and the members of that executive committee coming here and expressing their opinions upon this subject? None whatever. There were in this body very few, if any, members who could not have derived information, advantageous information, from consultation with those members of that association. On the other hand, has there been anybody here, has there been any interest brought to bear upon this body or upon any other body, that has thwarted the will of the people, that has made it impossible now for the Fifty-first Congress in its first session to secure any legislation in accordance, as I believe, with the will of the people of this country and in accordance with the very decided expression of opinion of this body?

Mr. President, I aver here, and I think nobody will deny it, that there has never been so much pressure brought upon the American Congress at any time, certainly not in the thirteen years that I have been connected with public affairs, as has been brought to defeat the free coinage of silver at this session of Congress.

We were told that there was a silver ring, and that gentlemen high in public place had been invited to participate in a silver speculating ring. I shall not assert what any gentleman alleges to be untrue, but if there has been a silver ring connected with the agitation of the silver question, I have not known of it myself, and I shall have an opportunity, I think, to say, and I think it will be fair to me say, that I do not believe that any has existed. It is barely possible that there are men who might have desired to organize a silver ring, but I do not believe there has been any, or any attempt to get up a ring to unduly increase the price of silver; and if there had been such an effort made it would only have been in accord with the efforts made in other sections and other interests pending legislation in this body.

Mr. President, as I have stated, I believe the American people are decidedly in favor of the free coinage of silver. I believe the American people are now to be cheated out of what they desire, and I believe it is beyond the power of this body to secure to the American people free coinage at this session of Congress; not that I do not believe there is in the House of Representatives more than a majority in favor of free coinage, but because I believe under a system which I do not myself speak of with much patience that voice is stifled and will not be heard. And, Mr. President, it will never be heard until the people of the United States shall send to that body and to this men who are willing to represent them and to represent them in spite of the exterior influences which may be brought to bear upon them, men who are able to withstand the ridicule of the great metropolitan press, men who are able to withstand the influences that the money power of this country knows so well how to bring to bear, men who are enabled to withstand the influences of an Administration and who are willing to forego the favors of the Executive for the purpose of doing that which they consider to be right.

Now, Mr. President, the compromise in this conference report is not satisfactory to me. I did not expect that it would be. Nothing would be satisfactory to me save the free coinage of silver. It is the only proper way to dispose of this question. It is the only way that it will ever be settled. This is a temporary expedient at the best, as was the Bland bill, and the next Congress will be vexed with this question as much as this. I regret that the committee, if they were determined not to give us free coinage, which I suppose would have been an impossibility—I suppose it was impossible for the committee on the part of the Senate to secure from the other branch of Congress under the condition of things there existing any such thing as free coinage of silver—could not in this bill have been a little more explicit.

I exceedingly regret that in the fifth and sixth lines of the proposed bill they should have put what seems to be a discretionary power in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury. I agree with the Senator from Ohio that it is hardly to be expected that the Secretary of the Treasury would make an excuse of this provision of the bill for the purpose of nullifying the plain intention of the act. The intention of this act is that there shall be purchased every month not less than 4,500,000 ounces of silver. A Senator asks me if I mean that it leaves any discretion. I do not think that the strict and proper interpretation of the bill does leave any discretion with him. That is what I was about to say.

Mr. VEST. Let me ask the Senator from Colorado a question. That is a very important point in this debate, as to the discretion in regard to this purchase. The language to which he has referred in the fifth and sixth lines of the first section provides for the "purchase from time to time" of "silver bullion to the aggregate amount of 4,500,000 ounces, or so much thereof as may be offered." That language is not found in the Bland act or in any other act of Congress heretofore, and I tried to ascertain from the Senator from Ohio, who made this report, what this language was put in here for. Now, I will ask the Senator from Colorado in regard to its being mandatory or discretionary. We know very well that the price of silver will be fixed by the Treasury Department. Suppose, now, that the Secretary of the Treasury fixes the prices of silver and then the holders of bullion do not offer it, does he not control that market as to the amount that is to be coined?

Mr. TELLER. I do not agree with the Senator from Missouri that the Treasury Department will fix the price of silver.

Mr. VEST. Of course, the Government being the largest purchaser will fix it as they do now.

Mr. TELLER. I do not concede the right of the Secretary to fix the price of silver. The market price of silver is fixed by the course of trade.

Mr. VEST. In whom rests the discretion as to what is the market price?

Mr. TELLER. There is no discretion. He must determine what the market price is, which is not at all difficult, and to say that the Secretary of the Treasury would not do that honestly and fairly, of course, is to charge him with an impeachable offense, one that the House would very deservedly bring him to bar for; but, Mr. President, there is no reason why it should have been put in.

Mr. VEST. Although the Senator was not in the conference committee, I would like to know what his idea is as to the reason why this language was put in, never found in any other bill.

Mr. TELLER. I was about to say that there was no reason why it should have been put in. I do not suppose there is any question but what the silver will be offered. I have no doubt that it will be offered to the extent of 4,500,000 ounces a month, but if it should go to par, if it should be worth $1.29 an ounce, then I admit that it is possible it would not be offered. Then we should have reached a condition of affairs where I believe everybody admits we should open our mints. It is scarcely possible that that condition of things will arise when Congress is not in session. It would be for the legislative department of the Government then to meet the condition of affairs by opening the mints to the free coinage of silver.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to ask the Senator a question at such a time as he is willing to be interrupted.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to know why it was provided in this conference report that the two millions minimum now required by law to be coined monthly should after the 1st day of July next not be coined unless the Secretary of the Treasury desired or deemed it proper. In other words, why have the people of the United States been deprived in this conference report of the right to have at least $2,000,000 of silver coined each month? I should like to hear the Senator upon that point.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not know that I can give any reason for the committee, and as I agree fully with the Senator from Mississippi that it would be very much better to coin all the silver bought, I am not in any condition to answer that question, unless it may be that that is a sop thrown to the people who are crazy, growing out of their ignorance as a general rule or out of their hatred of silver in some cases to have the suspension of all coinage of silver; and that is another compromise, I suppose, that silver shall be coined to 1891, and then it shall be discontinued except under the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. GEORGE. May I interrupt the Senator now?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from Colorado knows very well that when I entered the Senate this morning I was predisposed to vote for this conference committee report upon the ground that we had made a positive advance in the coinage of silver, that whereas now we had only the privilege or the right to have $2,000,000 a month coined, that under this new bill we shall have, I believe, as a Senator told me this morning, about $2,800,000 in addition—he made the calculation—to the two millions we now have. My idea was that if we lost nothing by the bill but made a positive gain in the coinage of silver of two millions eight or nine hundred thousand dollars per month, although this gain did not meet my expectations and my desires, I would be very willing to go to that extent; but now it is argued, and with force, and the Senator from Colorado seems to yield that point, that within a year from this time we are to lose the advantage which we now have secured to us by law of a compulsory coinage of $2,000,000 a month. So I fear, Mr. President, and to that I desire to call the Senator's attention, that if we pass this bill as recommended by the conference committee it will be a retrograde instead of an advanced movement in favor of the free coinage of silver.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, if I said anything about $2,800,000 in addition, I referred to the circulation that would be increased that amount, and not to coinage.

Now, there is a great difference of opinion among men who are in favor of the use of silver as money as to the propriety of continuing the coinage of silver; whether, if we can make use of it as money just as well without coining it, and if we can secure the knowledge to the whole world that it can never be put out except in the shape of coin, that when it is once lodged in the Treasury it must remain there always unless it is coined, it is wise to continue to coin it or not.

It is asserted with great force that if we have an international agreement that international agreement must be upon a ratio of 15½ to 1. I think everybody admits that the world over. That would necessitate the recoinage of our silver, and of course we should lose what it costs to coin it in the first instance. It is said with great force that if it is not necessary for use as coin, it having been devoted to coin purposes and the world understanding that it can not be put on the market as bullion, it is in just as good condition to do money duty through the certificate as if it was coined.

The change of ratio, if we have an international agreement at all, will necessitate not only the coining of all that is hereafter coined, but the present coinage also, because no mints of Europe would be open unless we should enter into a stipulation with them that we would recoin our money, for if we did not do that they would have a certainty when they opened their mints that the three hundred and odd million dollars of silver in the Treasury would find its way out into the hands of the holders of certificates and immediately go to Europe. That everybody has understood, I suppose, if we enter into an international arrangement at all, which I need not stop here now to say everybody who has given this subject thought knows is most desirable, and I need not repeat what I have said over and over again, that it is almost criminal on the part of our Government that we have not had that arrangement made, because it would have been made if there had been proper efforts on the part of this Administration and the one which preceded it.

It is believed by some that the continued coinage stands in the way of an international arrangement. I do not share in those fears, because if the coin is in the Treasury it will be easy for the Government to stipulate that that coin shall be taken up and recoinage, and if it is afloat in the country it will be necessary for the Government to exchange that for a dollar of less value, paying to the holder the difference between that and the new dollar. Those are the practical questions that we have to meet when we make an international arrangement.

So, Mr. President, I do not attach so much importance to the fact that the coinage continues only one year, because if there is a proper effort made within those twelve months that the coinage is to continue there can be an international arrangement made, and I believe it will be made, for I believe the whole world now has reached such a financial condition that it is considered desirable by all the world, save and except England and Germany, that such an international arrangement should be made to include all, if possible, and even Germany and England are exceedingly anxious now that some international arrangement shall be made between us and other sections of the world.

It has been suggested to me that the bill does not leave it discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury after 1891 as to the amount that he can coin. It leaves him the judge of how much is necessary. Of course if there is a demand made on him for coin, that will make it necessary for him to coin silver. If no demand is made, I think he will exercise that power by not coining silver. I have no doubt about that.

Now, there is another objection made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], which I think is not an objection at all, and that is to the concluding portion of section 2 of this bill:

That upon demand of the holder of any of the Treasury notes herein provided for the Secretary of the Treasury shall, under such regulations as he may prescribe, redeem such notes in gold or silver coin, at his discretion.

When you make the certificates redeemable in coin they are redeemable in silver or gold at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, and if this section had simply said they shall be redeemable in coin, that is just as good and just as definite and just as exact as the statement made in this bill. It means, as the Senator from Nevada says, precisely the same thing. Then the following is added:

It being the established policy of the United States to maintain the two metals on a parity with each other upon the present legal ratio, or such ratio as may be provided by law.

That is a declaration that may seem to be out of place in the bill, but it can do no harm with the bill, and it is a declaration, on our part at least, that we propose to continue the use of silver as money.

On the 29th of May I offered the following concurrent resolution, which I have allowed to lie on the table because of the condition of this bill up to the present time, but which I had proposed to call the attention of the Senate to when this bill should have been disposed of:

Be it resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring). That it is the determined policy of the United States Government to use both gold and silver as full legal-tender money under the ratio now existing in the United States, or that may be hereafter established by the United States alone, or acting in accord with other nations.

That seems to me to be the sentiment that is now put in the second section of this bill.

I have looked over this bill to see what it would do if it should become a law. I believe yesterday silver was worth about a dollar and four and one-quarter cents per ounce, and to-day I understand it is somewhat higher. It would require, then, at yesterday's prices $4,700,000 to buy 4,500,000 ounces of silver, and if silver should advance 5 per cent., or to $1.05, it would require $4,725,000 in money to buy it. If it should go to $1.10 it would require $4,950,000. If it went to $1.20 it would require $5,400,000, and if it went to par it would require $5,814,000 per month. This would give to us, at $1.10, about $59,400,000 per annum, and at $1.29 it would give a trifle less than $70,000,000 per annum of increase of currency.

Mr. President, I have believed, and believe now, that there has been a great demand for money in the United States; that the people of the United States have suffered for many years because of lack of circulation until it has become absolutely unbearable to the people of some sections of the country. The tendency of this age and of this civilization is to concentrate great quantities of money in the financial centers. New York has been full of money when the people in the West and in the South have been pressed for money, and there has not been a sufficiency of circulation. Nobody in this controversy has claimed that there was. The Secretary of the Treasury in his report declares there is not, the President has declared there was not, the chambers of commerce and boards of trade have everywhere proclaimed that there was a demand for more money. The low prices, the foreclosures of mortgages, the oppression that is felt by the laboring people of this country, particularly the farming classes, are indicative of a lack of a sufficient circulation.

The best method we could have devised for releasing those people from these burdens would, in my judgment, have been to open our mints to silver, and I should not myself have been frightened if I had seen a hundred million, nay, if I had seen five hundred million of silver coming to this country from abroad. The people of the United States in their business need to-day more than $300,000,000 more money than they have had and than they have, and they are not going to get it under this bill or any other that is proposed. It is proposed by this bill, if silver goes to par, which I would not like to say it will, that we shall have $70,000,000. I am not sanguine myself that it will go to par; nay, more, I do not believe it will under this bill, nor do I believe it will ever go to par until there is a full recognition of silver as a money metal in all respects equal to gold in its treatment by this great Government. But if it goes to par we shall have $70,000,000. We shall release by this bill sixty-odd million dollars more that is tied up in the Treasury. So we shall have $130,000,000 during the next year if silver goes to par. We shall have somewhere in the neighborhood of from one hundred to one hundred and ten million dollars under any circumstances if this bill becomes a law.

The simple question presented to me is the practical one whether as a friend not simply of bimetalism, not simply as an advocate of the double standard, but as one whose duty it is here to provide the people of the United States some currency with which they can do business and with which they can save their farms from the mortgages and the judgments that have been rendered on them, we can not by the increase of currency increase the price of farm products in this country and the value of farms, and thus save many men who are now absolutely approaching bankruptcy from meeting that unfortunate condition. If this bill is not made a law I see no promise of any relief whatever to the stagnated business of this country.

There is no other method with which I am familiar by which we can put any considerable amount of money in circulation according to sound financial principles except in connection with the purchase of silver, and as much as I dislike to adopt a half-way measure, a measure that to me is somewhat repugnant, not only repugnant because of some conditions in the bill, but repugnant by the measures and the means that have been taken to thwart the will of the people as I believe it would have been expressed if there had been a fair and decent opportunity given for that expression—reluctant, I say, as I may be, I am compelled to support this measure as the only one that offers any relief to the people of the United States for the next few months.

Congress will assemble in December and we shall be in session from then until the 4th of March. If this bill does not work well, then we can reform it. Another Congress will assemble soon after, when the people of the United States will have been heard upon this subject, when they will have had an opportunity to instruct their representatives not only in this body but in the other; and I mistake the temper of the American people and the public sentiment of the American people if the Fifty-second Congress does not deal with this subject in a way that is in full accord with my notions of right and my notions of justice, for I believe my notions of right and my notions of justice upon this question are those of the great majority of the people of the United States.

Therefore, Mr. President, with reluctance I shall support this measure, not believing that it affords the relief the people have a right to demand, but that it affords the only relief that we here can give to them owing to a condition of affairs that, I repeat, is not at all creditable to the American people.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, if this bill become a law and is executed in good faith, as we are bound to assume that it will be, and four and a half million ounces of silver are purchased each month, it will give great relief, and I am confident that it will be an object lesson that will lead to free coinage. It is true under the bill it is in the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to impair its usefulness by not purchasing the full amount each month, but any failure to do so on the pretext that it was not offered at the European market value would be such a plain violation of the spirit of the law that it would bring down universal condemnation, and we can not assume or believe that there will be any such dealing with the administration of the law. I believe that we shall purchase the full four and a half million ounces each month; that it will raise the price of silver and enhance the price of farm products, increase our exports and increase the exports of farm products, relieve the American people more than many now anticipate, and that ultimately we shall have the full use of silver.

I am confident that if by the administration of this bill it does not meet the anticipation of the people, or with its full administration it does not answer the purpose, the country is sufficiently educated now to take the next step immediately. If it works well—furnishes the relief desired—it will stand for a considerable time; it will stand probably until we can get co-operation with the Latin Union. I do not anticipate co-operation with England and Germany. I think we shall make no effort to get them. England has been on a single gold standard since 1819 by the act which she passed in 1816, and it is not probable that she will change. Germany has adopted the policy of England, and they can stand on a gold basis.

France, and the associated nations with France, and the United States are abundantly able to maintain bimetalism without any doubt on the part of any one who has considered the subject. I have no doubt that the United States can do it alone. Others have some doubts on that subject. They have consented to take this step, which is in the right direction, and it is a law that we can get; it is all that we can get; and it seems to me that it should receive the vote of every friend of silver.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOLPH in the chair). The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I can not vote for this conference report. My objections to it I will state as briefly as I can.

I do not agree with the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] in his interpretation of the first section of this bill. He says that it is mandatory upon the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase 4,500,000 ounces of silver monthly. I do not believe that that is the true interpretation of this clause. The language is:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to purchase from time to time silver bullion to the aggregate amount of 4,500,000 ounces—

Now, that would be mandatory, but the qualifying words are: or so much thereof as may be offered, in each month, at the market price thereof, not exceeding $1 for 371.25 grains of pure silver.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask the Senator a question right there?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. Does the Senator, in speaking of the qualifying words, refer more particularly to the words which speak of the market price?

Mr. COCKRELL. I refer to the words "or so much thereof as may be offered," in connection with the market price. I say that under this proposed law the Secretary of the Treasury determines, decides, declares what is the market price. Nobody else can do it.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. May I ask the Senator why equally the Secretary of the Treasury does not declare the market price under the Bland act? The law says that he shall buy at the market price, and fixes that as the price.

Mr. COCKRELL. Under the Bland act, which I hold in my hand, he must purchase a certain amount.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. At the market price?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes; but not "or so much thereof as may be offered, in each month, at the market price."

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. He could not buy more than the law fixed at the market price.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Bland act says that he must purchase not less than $2,000,000 worth in each month at the market price.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. But suppose he can not get it at the market price?

Mr. COCKRELL. But he always has done so.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. He fixes the market price equally under the Bland act as he will do under this bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. He fixes the market price there, but that amount is not one-half the product of the United States, while in this case you give him the power to purchase 4,500,000 ounces a month, which per year is greater than the product of the mines of the United States; and you say "or so much thereof as may be offered." You do not compel him by saying that he must purchase 4,500,000 ounces per month.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. Then the Senator is afraid there will not be that much silver offered to the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. COCKRELL. He is to purchase it at the price which the Secretary of the Treasury may determine to be the market price.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. But he is not obliged to buy the $2,000,000 worth a month under the Bland act, except at the market price.

Mr. COCKRELL. I say he is obliged to buy $2,000,000 worth a month under the Bland act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri will suspend for a moment. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3738) to place the American merchant marine, engaged in the foreign trade, upon an equality with that of other nations.

Mr. FRYE. This conference report being privileged, I ask that that bill may be informally laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered, unless there is objection. The Chair hears none. The Senator from Missouri will proceed, the conference report being before the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, the Bland act is very simple. I have it here in my hand and will read it.

That there shall be coined, at the several mints of the United States, silver dollars of the weight of 412½ grains troy of standard silver, as provided in the act of January 18, 1837, on which shall be the devices and superscriptions provided by said act; which coins together with all silver dollars heretofore coined by the United States, of like weight and fineness, shall be a legal tender at their nominal value, for all debts and dues public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract. And the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to purchase, from time to time, silver bullion, at the market price thereof, not less than $2,000,000 worth per month, nor more than $4,000,000 worth per month, and cause the same to be coined monthly, as fast as so purchased, into such dollars; and a sum sufficient to carry out the foregoing provision of this act is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

There the Secretary has just as much authority precisely to purchase $4,000,000 worth as he has to purchase $2,000,000 worth, and every Secretary of the Treasury, Republican or Democratic, has exercised that discretion by purchasing the minimum, $2,000,000 worth per month. Have we any assurance that the present Secretary of the Treasury or any future Secretary may not exercise the same discretion and purchase just as little as possible under the law?

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. No; he can not do it. There is no discretion.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Nevada says that there is no discretion. A moment ago the Senator said it was the same discretion that was given in the Bland act.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. That is no discretion.

Mr. COCKRELL. No discretion?

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. No.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then the Secretary is compellable. Why has not the Secretary purchased $4,000,000 worth per month under the Bland act?

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I understood the Senator from Nevada to ask the Senator from Missouri, and I should like to have him answer that question, if under the Bland law, so called, the Secretary of the Treasury has the power to fix the market price at which the silver bullion is purchased.

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, no.

Mr. PLUMB. Let me make a suggestion there.

Mr. SPOONER. If he has not the power under the Bland act to fix the market price, how does he obtain the power to fix the market price under the proposed law when the language is precisely the same?

Mr. COCKRELL. I will explain that. He has no discretion under the Bland act, but must purchase $2,000,000 worth a month.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. At the market price.

Mr. SPOONER. At the market price.

Mr. COCKRELL. He must purchase that much, and the price must be the market price, but it does not make a bit of difference what the market price is, he must purchase so much silver.

Mr. PLUMB. That is to say, instead of fixing the market price he simply determines for Treasury purposes what the market price is. That he has to find out. He has to purchase $2,000,000 worth a month and he has to purchase at the market price. He can not make the market price, not being the only purchaser of silver, but he can determine what the market price is, and when he has determined that he buys the silver at that price.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, the Bland act says the Secretary of the Treasury shall—there is no discretion about it—purchase not less than two million and not more than four million dollars' worth. He has the same discretion to purchase four million that he has two million. This is to be at the market price. If the Secretary of the Treasury purchases the minimum he is exercising a discretion against silver. He has purchased only the minimum, and he had to purchase that; there was no discretion about it up to that amount.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. At the market price.

Mr. COCKRELL. At the market price; and he could not fix the price. Whatever it was offered to him at was the market price, and he was compelled to take it. Now, this bill here is no such thing; it is just the reverse.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask the Senator from Missouri a question?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly; certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. Suppose this conference report is adopted and the bill reported by the conference committee becomes a law, and some owner of silver bullion every month in the year as the months come around offers to the Secretary of the Treasury 4,500,000 ounces of silver at the market price. He says to him, "I have 4,500,000 ounces of silver that I want to sell to you as Secretary of the Treasury, and I now offer it to you, and I propose to take for it the market price, whatever that is." Now, I want to know if in a case of that kind the Secretary of the Treasury has any discretion to say that he will not buy it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Not if the question of fixing the price is left to the Secretary of the Treasury and it is offered. But suppose the Secretary fixes the price in advance and nobody offers it, then where are you? Not an ounce would be offered.

Mr. MITCHELL. By what authority or upon what principle does the Senator say that the Secretary can fix the price?

Mr. COCKRELL. I will show you. The bill provides—

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to purchase from time to time silver bullion to the aggregate amount of 4,500,000 ounces, or so much thereof as may be offered, in each month, at the market price.

He is not compellable to purchase 4,500,000 ounces; there is no compulsion. He is only compellable to purchase as much as may be offered of that amount at the price which he may declare to be the market price. That is the legitimate and proper construction of this proposed act.

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri how the market price to-day would be determined as to silver. Would it not be the quotable valuation not only here but in London and Liverpool and Paris, wherever silver may be offered for sale; and is that rule likely to be changed? Is it not a permanent and fixed and certain method by which the valuations of precious metals and other commodities which are articles of commerce are determined?

Mr. COCKRELL. No, Mr. President, for the determination of the price of silver there is no rule. It fluctuates precisely like wheat, like oats, like bacon, like lard, like any other product.

Mr. PADDOCK. Is not that the case now? Are not the purchases made now under the same rule?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly they are.

Mr. PADDOCK. The market price is determined under that rule now, and has been ever since the authority was given to purchase $2,000,000 worth of bullion a month.

Mr. COCKRELL. Unquestionably it has, but there was compulsion, $2,000,000 worth had to be purchased and coined and $4,000,000 worth might be purchased and coined; but no Secretary has ever exercised the discretion in favor of silver.

Mr. PADDOCK. It can not be purchased unless somebody offers it.

Mr. COCKRELL. What does the Senator say?

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Missouri to yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly I yield. I will yield to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] in a moment.

Mr. PADDOCK. It can not be purchased unless somebody offers to sell it. There has got to be an offer for sale; somebody has to present the silver for sale before any purchase can be made.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. PADDOCK. And the price is fixed in the markets of the world; under a commercial usage as inexorable as law.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now will the Senator allow me?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. COCKRELL. With pleasure.

Mr. MITCHELL. The question I desire to ask the Senator from Missouri is this: He says the Secretary of the Treasury under the Bland act has the power and the right to fix the price of silver. Suppose he should determine what price he would pay, and he would say so to the owners of silver bullion, and not a man should respond, there would not be an ounce furnished, and therefore he could not buy and would not buy. What I want to know is, would the Secretary of the Treasury be impeachable for not buying $2,000,000 worth per month under the Bland act in that case.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, he would be under the Bland act, just the reverse of what he would be under this proposed act. He must purchase not less than $2,000,000 worth per month under the Bland act. You have no limit here.

Mr. MITCHELL. He, then, under the Bland act could fix the price at one-half what it was worth in his discretion?

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, no, no.

Mr. MITCHELL. And then because the bullion was not forthcoming he would be impeachable for not buying it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Not at all. I said no such thing.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is the logic of the Senator's argument.

Mr. COCKRELL. I was speaking of what could be done under this proposed law, and the Senator is mistaken. In the plainest interpretation and the plainest English, I say under the Bland act the Secretary was compelled to purchase not less than $2,000,000 worth a month and not more than $4,000,000 worth, it made no difference what the price was.

Mr. MITCHELL. But the Senator—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. COCKRELL. With pleasure.

Mr. MITCHELL. But the Senator says in the same breath that the Secretary of the Treasury fixes the price, and that the Bland act provides that the bullion must be purchased at the market price.

Mr. COCKRELL. At the market price?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, let the Secretary fix it under the Bland act. Suppose he says that a certain figure is the market price and it is not offered, and another man offers it at a higher price; he is compelled to take it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Suppose nobody offers any?

Mr. COCKRELL. That supposition is not possible—

Mr. MITCHELL. It is.

Mr. COCKRELL. Because we produce in this country over $2,000,000 worth every month.

Mr. MITCHELL. But the Senator from Missouri has insisted from the first in his argument to-day that in the Bland act the Secretary of the Treasury was absolutely compelled to buy at least $2,000,000 worth every month.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly, there is no question about it; and I will repeat it if the Senator is not satisfied about it.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator says, furthermore, that the Secretary of the Treasury has the power to fix the price. Now, I say as to that, suppose he fixes the price at a figure that nobody will sell at, and therefore he can not buy at the market price, as the law compels him to buy, is he impeachable?

Mr. COCKRELL. I said under the Bland act he would be, because he is compelled to purchase that amount, and whatever the price may be he must purchase it. If he says the market price is one thing and the only offers he can get are at a higher price, he must purchase at that higher price.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I ask the Senator if there is any different statement—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. COCKRELL. With pleasure.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. Is there any different statement regarding the market price in this conference bill and in the Bland act?

Mr. COCKRELL. Not so far as purchasing at the market price is concerned, but there is as to the amount to be purchased.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. But it must be offered in either case.

Mr. COCKRELL. No, not a bit of it.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. No purchaser can buy unless the article is offered.

Mr. COCKRELL. Ah, that is a roundabout reasoning. The Bland act says—

That there shall be coined, at the several mints—

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. When offered and purchased.

Mr. COCKRELL. I beg pardon; it does not say any such thing; not a word of it. The Bland act says—

That there shall be coined, at the several mints of the United States, silver dollars of the weight of 412½ grains. * * * And the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to purchase, from time to time, silver bullion, at the market price thereof.

How? "Or for so much thereof as may be offered?" Not a word of it.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. Mr. President—

Mr. COCKRELL. Wait just a moment. He is compellable to purchase silver bullion at the market price thereof—not less than $2,000,000 worth per month, nor more than $4,000,000 worth per month.

Not as in the present bill, "or so much thereof as may be offered," but not less than so much, and not more than so much.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. COCKRELL. With pleasure.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. The words "directed to purchase" and "shall purchase" mean substantially the same thing; and it strikes me the Senator is making a mountain out of a mole-hill. The fact of the business is, that it was believed, and I believe, unless the production of silver shall largely increase, the 4,500,000 ounces per month will more than exhaust the world's demand at the rate of a dollar for 371½ grains of pure silver, and that clause was simply put in so that in case all the silver available for purchase was exhausted, the Secretary of the Treasury would have fulfilled the law by purchasing all that was offered at a price not exceeding a dollar for 371½ grains.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I profess I am profoundly astonished at the silver-tongued orator from Nevada, the senior Senator, in his last statement in regard to the product and the reason why the clause "or so much thereof" was inserted. The country had learned to look at the distinguished Senator as the great champion of the double standard, of the perfect equality of gold and silver as coin and bullion. The clarion notes of his eloquent, logical speech in this body had sounded and echoed throughout the length and breadth of the land, and the people had cried aloud, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant." But when the people of this country read this compromise report, I fear their opinion of my distinguished friend, the great champion of the double standard, will be changed.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I am not afraid of it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I fear it will be changed, for I assert that this bill gives away every particle of what was proposed in the Senate substitute for silver as the equal of gold. This reverts back to the single gold standard and leaves silver as a mere commodity, mere merchandise, like wheat, and tobacco, and corn, and oats, as I shall show before I finish.

But I insist that one of the fatal defects in this bill is in the first clause, "or so much thereof as may be offered," and that the Secretary has an absolute discretion first to fix the market price and then to take only what is offered. He may say that the price in London shall be the market price here.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. COCKRELL. With great pleasure.

Mr. DANIEL. Where is there any authority in this bill for the Secretary of the Treasury to fix what is the market price? Is there any authority in the bill for the Secretary of the Treasury to fix the market price?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly. He is to purchase it, and purchase it at the market price, and therefore he must fix the price.

Mr. DANIEL. He is to ascertain and find out what is the market price.

Mr. COCKRELL. He is to determine it, to fix it.

Mr. DANIEL. He is not to prescribe what it shall be.

Mr. COCKRELL. Why not? I say he is to fix it by determining what it is. That is fixing the price. He ascertains what it is; he learns what it is; he may say that the price in London shall be the market price in the United States, and that is the great center of the silver market of the world, where it is measured as a mere commodity by the single gold standard of Great Britain, or he may say that the market price in France—

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly, I will yield.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator if the Secretary of the Treasury fixes the price, which he calls the market price, and there is yet another market price in London, New York, Paris, and the other great commercial marts of Europe and of this country, which is accepted by the dealers of the world as the market price governing all transactions in silver everywhere, which of these market prices would obtain, and control, and govern as to the purchases under this law by the Secretary.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not understand the Senator's question. What is it? Let me hear it again.

Mr. PADDOCK. I say if the Secretary of the Treasury has authority, as the Senator says, and should make what he should call a market price himself, and there should be yet another market price, a different market price known to London, known to Paris, known to New York, which market price would obtain, the one fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury or the one fixed and recognized everywhere, for the dealings of the world in silver bullion?

Mr. COCKRELL. The one fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, as a matter of course.

Mr. PADDOCK. Not at all.

Mr. COCKRELL. By the Secretary of the Treasury. He alone fixes the price. He alone determines what the price is in the market.

Mr. PADDOCK. But he must take the market price which the world accepts as the market price, which the rules of commerce and of trade establish and determine as the market price at the time he purchases.

Mr. COCKRELL. The price varies; it goes up and down on the same day. In the morning it opens at one price and in the evening it closes at another. Now, the Secretary determines what is the price on that day, and he can fix it just as he pleases within the range. I admit that no Secretary would probably undertake to fix a price entirely disproportionate to what the market price might be in buying and selling where there was buying and selling, but within the lines of fluctuation he would fix it.

Mr. PADDOCK. Yes, within the lines of fluctuation, within the range of prices which obtain in the markets of the world he must confine himself. That is the market price which the law determines as the market price.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let me ask the Senator a question, answering him in a Yankee way by asking him a question. What is the world's market price?

Mr. PADDOCK. The world's market price is established by the consensus of all dealers. It is the price which is regulated by the dealings daily and hourly, every day and every week, throughout the world.

Mr. COCKRELL. When they fluctuate—

Mr. PADDOCK. From hour to hour, from day to day, and from week to week.

Mr. COCKRELL. When they are one thing in New York to-day, another in Chicago, another in Kansas City and St. Louis, and a different one in England, and a different one in Paris, and a different one at some other place, what is the consensus?

Mr. PADDOCK. But they are all the same, taking into account the differences in the conditions and situations.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am astonished at the Senator undertaking to say that there is a given sum which is the world's price for any merchandise or commodity.

Mr. PADDOCK. Does not the Senator know that the price of silver is quoted four or five times a day, or perhaps even more frequently in all the leading markets of the world?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes; and it varies at every quotation.

Mr. PADDOCK. That quotation is what the world recognizes; and by it all transactions are governed.

Mr. COCKRELL. It varies at each quotation. Now, varying at each quotation and each day, what is the market price?

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. SPOONER. Has there been any difficulty, does the Senator know, in ascertaining the market price for purchases under the Bland law?

Mr. COCKRELL. I suppose not, because there was a greater quantity in the market than there was a demand for. There was a greater amount of bullion, and within the amount which the Secretary would offer to buy he would say, "I will give this day so much an ounce," and they would gladly take it, because there was no other market.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Secretary of the Treasury could without difficulty ascertain the market price under the Bland law, why may he not without difficulty ascertain the market price under this proposed law?

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. By the same means.

Mr. SPOONER. And by the same means. The market price would not be one thing under the operation of one law and another thing under the operation of the other, would it?

Mr. COCKRELL. In the exercise of the same discretion which every Secretary of the Treasury has exercised under the Bland act, to purchase just as little as possible, the Secretary will be bound, if he believes it right, to purchase just as little as possible; and if he can fix the market price, and there is no appeal from the price, and if he can fix the market price so that none will be offered, he will do it.

Mr. SPOONER. Is it not—

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask the permission of both the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Wisconsin to put a question. Suppose the holder of silver bullion should offer a given amount of silver to the Secretary of the Treasury, asserting that the market price is at the rate of $1 for 371½ grains of pure silver, and the Secretary of the Treasury should answer, "I want to buy silver, but the market price is 20 cents below that," who is to decide, with this issue between the holder and the Secretary of the Treasury? Would he buy at all; and if so, at what price would he buy?

Mr. SPOONER. The market price is a question of fact. The market price of any commodity is a question of fact. The market price of the day is known.

Mr. HARRIS. But when one of the contracting parties insists that the market price is one thing and the other proposed contracting party considers that the market price is another thing, is there any appeal from the decision of the purchaser?

Mr. SPOONER. It would obviously be for the Secretary of the Treasury to ascertain what is the market price, just as he has done under the Bland act, by what the quotations are when he advertises for the purchase of so much silver.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. Nobody disputes them; they are published every day.

Mr. SPOONER. The quotations are daily published, just as the quotations of wheat, and corn, and other commodities.

Mr. PADDOCK. In such a case as that, if the Senator from Wisconsin will allow me, where there may be a controversy as to price, of course it would be determined by the last quotation before the offer. That would control absolutely, and it so does now in every market of the world. The last quotation recorded and published controls the price of the article that is offered for sale thereafter until a new quotation is made as the result of a later sale.

Mr. COCKRELL. Suppose there was 3 cents difference on an ounce between the price in London and New York?

Mr. BLAIR. May I ask the Senator a question? There are two speaking on that side, and there ought to be two on this side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. COCKRELL. With a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to ask the Senator, if the Secretary of the Treasury is not to purchase at the market price, what price is it?

Mr. COCKRELL. He is to purchase at the market price provided it is offered, and now he has to ascertain, and determine, and declare what that market price is. Under the Bland act he must purchase $2,000,000 worth a month, and under this bill he will only purchase as much as may be offered. There is the difference between them.

Mr. BLAIR. At what price?

Mr. COCKRELL. One is an absolute, unconditional requirement, and the other is a discretionary one.

Mr. BLAIR. At what price is he to purchase under either measure?

Mr. COCKRELL. Under the Bland act he is to purchase at the market price, but he must purchase $2,000,000 worth a month, and if he and the purchaser can not agree upon what the market price is he must purchase it at whatever he can get it at, because that will be the market price.

Mr. BLAIR. Under this bill or under that law?

Mr. COCKRELL. He must purchase it at whatever the holder will take for it. He must purchase it. He must have the $2,000,000 worth every month under the Bland act. He must take it at whatever price it is offered, and that will be to him the market price. But in this other case he is to purchase how much? Four million five hundred thousand ounces, "or so much thereof as may be offered, in each month, at the market price." Now, there is the difference between the two measures. One of them compels $2,000,000 worth to be purchased per month, and the purchase must be at the market price, and the Secretary must purchase it at whatever price it is offered, because he has no discretion as to the amount. He has a discretion from $2,000,000 worth up to $4,000,000 worth.

Mr. HISCOCK and Mr. JONES, of Nevada, addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri will suspend a moment until order is restored in the Senate Chamber. It is impossible to hear two or three Senators, or three or four, talking at one time.

Mr. COCKRELL. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. HISCOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Missouri if he will permit me—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. COCKRELL. I yield to anybody; one at a time is all I ask.

Mr. HISCOCK. Does the Secretary of the Treasury have the power to reject offers under the Bland act?

Mr. COCKRELL. If more than $2,000,000 worth is offered, but if—

Mr. HISCOCK. Wait.

Mr. COCKRELL. No; he has no right to reject over $2,000,000.

Mr. HISCOCK. Is that the only condition?

Mr. COCKRELL. He must purchase $2,000,000 worth, it makes no difference what the price is. There is no limit upon him in that respect. It must be purchased, and whatever price it is offered to him at is the market price.

Mr. BLAIR. Suppose $4,000,000 worth is offered under the bill—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. COCKRELL. I am yielding to the Senator from New York.

Mr. HISCOCK. Do I understand the Senator—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is impossible for the Reporter to hear a Senator speaking and the Chair at the same time. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. COCKRELL. No; I am yielding to the Senator from New York, and then I will hear the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HISCOCK. Do I understand the Senator from Missouri to argue that the Secretary of the Treasury has not the power to reject the offer on the ground of excessive price?

Mr. COCKRELL. Under what?

Mr. HISCOCK. Of silver, under the Bland law.

Mr. COCKRELL. No, to more than $2,000,000 worth a month.

Mr. HISCOCK. No matter what the price is. Do I understand the Senator to argue, no matter what price is attached to the offer, conceding that it is above the market price of the world 5 cents an ounce, he is compelled nevertheless to accept it?

Mr. COCKRELL. I say under the Bland act he must, without any discretion, coin $2,000,000 worth of silver per month—

Mr. HISCOCK. The Senator does not answer my question.

Mr. COCKRELL. Just wait till I finish my sentence. I say under the Bland act he must coin $2,000,000 worth of standard silver dollars per month, and he must obtain the bullion by purchase in the open market at the market price not less than $2,000,000 worth per month, but that over $2,000,000 worth and up to $4,000,000 worth he has a discretion.

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly there was no occasion to misunderstand my question, and it was susceptible of an answer. The question I asked the Senator was this: If the bullion is offered at the Treasury Department at manifestly more than the market price of the world, 5 cents an ounce or 10 cents an ounce more, do I understand the Senator from Missouri to argue that nevertheless the Secretary of the Treasury is bound to accept it?

Mr. COCKRELL. I answered that question. The Senator from New York can not expect to put a general question and have a general answer that is not compatible with the requirements of the law. If that offer is part of the $2,000,000 worth that is offered to him per month he must take it, and he has no discretion.

Mr. SPOONER. That would be the market price, then?

Mr. COCKRELL. It would be the market price there. The holder of the bullion fixes it instead of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HISCOCK. The Senator must understand that in the sale of silver the sale-rooms in New York and in Europe are public rooms.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly they are.

Mr. HISCOCK. The sales are a matter of record.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. HISCOCK. They are practically evidence in courts of justice of the market value of the commodity that is authorized to be sold.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. HISCOCK. Those sales fix judicially, if one may so say, the market price.

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, no; not judicially.

Mr. HISCOCK. Practically judicially.

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. HISCOCK. Practically judicially to the extent that the quotations there are received in courts as evidence of the value of the commodity, of the value of the bullion, or whatever it may be. There is no speculation as to price. There is no chance for what the Senator has supposed or did suppose a little while ago, for the Secretary of the Treasury to say, "I differ with you as to the price; silver is worth 20 cents an ounce less than you ask for it." Here is practically a determination in the trade of the world in respect to it. I may go further than that and say in reference to these sales that it would be a very exceptional case in which there would be any difference in the value of the silver offered in Liverpool or London and the United States. Only this condition could exist in the two places: possibly there might be a demand for silver here to such an extent as to require the importation of silver to meet that demand.

Mr. COCKRELL. There might be there, too.

Mr. HISCOCK. And there might be there, which would involve in the cost of the silver there and the cost of the silver here the difference of the transportation from one point to the other.

Mr. COCKRELL. Insurance, etc.

Mr. HISCOCK. That is all there is of it and all there can be of it. As I said a moment ago, the market price which is to be observed and which must be observed under this bill is recognized throughout the length and breadth of the commercial world, and I believe the Secretary of the Treasury who ignores it in the purchase of silver or in the execution of the law renders himself liable to impeachment and to degradation from his high office. Under this provision of the law there is no chance for playing upon its execution, cheating the public, or cheating the law-makers. Who dare do it? It is flashed all over the country through the markets of the world that the Secretary of the Treasury is higgling over words of the interpretation of the provision of the law, chaffing with a man who offered his silver and saying "I will not be controlled by the quotations in respect to it," and refusing the execution of the law. Does the Senator believe or suppose that in the administration of this bill we are to be confronted by any such condition as that? The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] fairly stated a sufficient reason why there certainly was no objection to this language being employed in the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to state how silver has been purchased for the last twelve years?

Mr. COCKRELL. With pleasure.

Mr. SHERMAN. Under regulations established shortly after the Bland-Allison bill, as it was called then, was passed, it was provided that every week, on a certain day of the week, bids would be invited from all the world for the delivery at the proper assay offices or mints, usually in New York, of so much silver bullion. The bids were always filed, and for the period of twelve years without fail there was always as much or more offered as the Secretary was authorized to buy.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly, there is no question about that.

Mr. SHERMAN. There never was a controversy as to the market value. It was really fixed by the bids, and the Secretary always took the lowest bids. Sometimes persons, in order to sell silver, would bid a little shade below what would be the market value. The Secretary of the Treasury would always designate the bids that were accepted, which were always the lowest bids, and the silver bullion was bought in that way.

From that time to this there has been no change in these regulations of the Treasury Department. There never was the slightest difficulty or doubt about the mode of purchasing bullion; and under the proposed law the same regulations will apply, except that if the purchase is larger than the domestic supply it may be that sellers would have to import the silver, and they would have to make their offers with that in view. Usually a period of ten days is allowed for the delivery of the silver bullion, and it is then paid for. So there will be no practical difficulty about it, except as the amount of silver to be purchased now is more than twice and a half what it was before. It may happen that the American market can not supply it, and the bids may be based upon the importation of silver, which would require a little more time to deliver it. That would be the only difference. It may be, possibly, that at certain times bullion might not be offered to the full amount required, and that is the reason why the words were introduced by common consent that if it was offered the Secretary should buy it to that extent. I have no doubt the same regulations will be continued, and the same process will go on.

Mr. HISCOCK. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. HISCOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Ohio before he takes his seat if one condition of things might not possibly exist in respect to silver. The market price is fixed in the markets of the world in respect to silver as it is in respect to a great many other commodities, marked up and down. Now, to fix the market price there must be a sale, and you might have a condition of things as to silver that you frequently have as to stocks; fixing the price at the sale which transpires, those who hold the commodity will not offer it for sale, and it is absolutely impossible for a purchaser to obtain it. That has existed in respect to stocks, to bonds, and why not with respect to silver?

Mr. SHERMAN. In answer to that, if the Senator from Missouri will allow me, I will say that I do not believe the case will ever arise under this measure where a sufficient amount of silver to the full maximum authorized by law will not be offered, because not only is the supply of the United States of America nearly approaching the sum, within a million ounces of what is now proposed, but the Mexican supply seeks its market naturally here, and I have no doubt in every case that will be likely to occur sufficient silver from the Mexican or American supply will be offered. It may happen, as I said before, that if it is not offered the Secretary may not be able to buy because it may have to be imported, and the bids would have to be based upon that importation, and probably a little longer time would have to be given for the delivery of the silver bullion. If the order would have to go to London it would require at least ten days to import it, with the necessary time to weigh and count, etc. I do not think there will be any practical difficulty in the execution of this proposed law any more than there has been before for twelve years.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Ohio has very frankly stated the method of business which has been pursued in the purchase of silver under what is known as the Bland act. As I said before, he has shown conclusively that there was always more offered than the Secretary would purchase, because the Secretary determined to exercise a discretion which he had, and which he could exercise in defiance of the public sentiment of the country, to purchase only $2,000,000 worth and not $4,000,000 worth. We see what every one of the Secretaries, Democratic and Republican, has done. That law compelled $2,000,000 worth to be purchased. There was not a particle of discretion about it; they had to purchase it and they had to purchase it at the market price, and that market price was the price offered to be taken by the holder of the bullion. The holder of the bullion fixed the price, and the Secretary had to take it; but the moment he got his $2,000,000 worth per month, he refused to take another particle of silver in the exercise of his discretion when he could have taken $4,000,000 worth per month.

Now, the language of this bill is very unfortunate. It gives the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to the whole 4,500,000 ounces precisely the same discretion which he had to exercise in regard to only $2,000,000 worth, and do you tell me that he will not exercise that discretion against silver? There never has been a Secretary since the war but who did do it, and I fear that the present and future Secretaries will do the same. It is to be 4,500,000 ounces, "or so much thereof as may be offered."

Mr. HISCOCK. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. COCKRELL. With pleasure.

Mr. HISCOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator if he can point to any Secretary of the Treasury who has discriminated against silver by refusing to obey the mandate of the law. That is the question which is presented here.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, sir; every one of them.

Mr. HISCOCK. In what respect?

Mr. COCKRELL. Since the passage of the Bland act every solitary Secretary of the Treasury has peremptorily and unqualifiedly refused to pay one solitary silver dollar in payment of any of the bonded indebtedness of the United States or the interest thereon, when every bond says upon its face, "redeemable in coin of the standard value of the United States on said July 14, 1870."

Mr. HISCOCK. The question I asked the Senator was not that, but whether they had ever discriminated against silver by refusing to obey the plain mandate of the law.

Mr. COCKRELL. The law says—

Mr. HISCOCK. Wait a moment. That they may have exercised a discretion that the Senator believed was a discrimination against silver and that I may believe was not a discrimination against silver, I grant; but that is not the question. Where the mandate of the law is clear and express, wherein has there ever been a violation of it? So far as the bonds were concerned, the Senator admits that the Secretaries had the same power to pay in gold that they had to pay in silver. They had the exercise of a discretion and they exercised it by gold payments. That does not answer my question.

Mr. COCKRELL. If the Senator wants me to point out an impeachable offense which any Secretary of the Treasury has committed in refusing to pay out the silver dollar, as a matter of course I make no such pretension, but I said "discrimination," and I say "discrimination" to-day.

Mr. HISCOCK. When the Senator comes to examine his remarks he will discover that the word "discrimination" was not the one he used.

Mr. COCKRELL. I said "discrimination against silver," and I say it to-day; and I say that every Secretary of the Treasury has peremptorily refused, and the distinguished Senator from Ohio will not deny that every Secretary of the Treasury has refused to pay the standard silver dollar in payment of the United States bonds or the interest on them, although every one of the bonds has stamped upon its face, "redeemable in coin of the standard value of the United States on said July 14, 1870," and on that day the standard silver dollar of 412½ grains, 9 parts fine, was equally a standard dollar with the gold dollar of 25½ grains, 9 parts fine. That discrimination has been made all the time.

Mr. HISCOCK. The difference between—

Mr. COCKRELL. It is not a violation of law in the strict sense of the word. It is the exercise of a discretion by discrimination and unfriendliness to silver.

Mr. HISCOCK. The difference that I desire to call the Senator's attention to between what has been done and what must be done if what he has indicated is done, is that in the one case there would be the exercise of a discretion within the letter of the law, and in the other case there would be a plain violation of the letter of the law.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is precisely where the distinguished Senator from New York is mistaken. This purchase of 4,500,000 ounces is not mandatory upon the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury under the Bland act has exercised his discretion. He was compelled to purchase $2,000,000 worth of silver bullion, and might purchase $4,000,000 worth. His discretion has been against silver by purchasing the least amount he had to purchase, as to the purchase of which he had no discrimination; but here comes a substitute for that law which says that the Secretary of the Treasury is directed "to purchase from time to time silver bullion to the aggregate amount of 4,500,000 ounces." Does it stop there? Does it say not less than 4,500,000 ounces, or does it say not less than 4,000,000 ounces and not over 4,500,000 ounces? It says nothing of the kind, but it says that he shall "purchase from time to time silver bullion to the aggregate amount of 4,500,000 ounces, or so much thereof as may be offered in each month, at the market price thereof." He has the discretion, then, to determine how much of it has been offered at the market price, and he may exercise that discretion, like every one of them has done, against silver. It will be no plain violation of the law, as the distinguished Senator from New York pretends; it will be an exercise of a discretion; and when he does it the distinguished Senator from New York will be one of the first Senators on this floor to get up and justify him in doing it. The Senator from New York will be one of the first whose voice will be heard stating that the Secretary of the Treasury had done exactly right in fixing a price and refusing to take silver not offered at that price.

But, Mr. President, that is not the only objection I have to this bill. The Treasury notes are practically greenbacks. They are United States legal-tender notes. They are endowed by law with all of the rights, privileges, and immunities of the legal-tender note, so called, or the greenback. They are the United States Treasury notes, and they are to be issued under this bill in an amount equal to the market value of the bullion purchased. Then they are to be redeemed by the Secretary of the Treasury, under such regulations as he may prescribe, in gold or silver coin, at his discretion.

What does that mean, Mr. President? I warn Senators that this language is fraught with mischief. It gives a power which has never yet been given to the Secretary in many, many long years. Under this proposed law what can the Secretary do? He has a discretion; he can redeem in the standard silver dollar or he can redeem in the gold dollar.

Suppose he redeems in the gold dollar. Suppose the enemies of silver, who have been fighting it for years and years with a pertinacity and determination unequalled in the history of the world, combine. They bring in these certificates and they demand gold in payment of them. What is it they present? It is a greenback, a legal-tender United States note. By law it is placed upon a perfect par with the greenbacks. It comes under the provisions of the resumption act of January 4, 1875. I say every Secretary of the Treasury we have ever had has done it, and the present Secretary in my judgment will redeem every one of them with gold. What are they holding? In the Treasury $100,000,000, as they claim, for the redemption of the legal-tender greenback. Those notes are presented and the gold is taken out of the Treasury. Then the enemies of silver will say, "Here we are upon a single silver standard." The Secretary of the Treasury will say that in honor the United States must pay its bonds in gold coin, and under the resumption act of January 14, 1875, to continue the redemption of the greenbacks in gold when presented in the payment of the bonds, he will issue and sell coin bonds at just the price he may think is the market price of them, and the silver dollars will remain hoarded up in the Treasury and never be issued. The gold will be taken from the Treasury and placed in the hands of the speculators, and then, when additional gold is demanded of the Secretary of the Treasury, he will have power under the law to issue bonds. To show that I am not mistaken in this, I will quote the resumption act of 1875, "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments:"

And on and after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem in coin the United States legal-tender notes then outstanding.

On and after that date the Secretary shall redeem in coin the legal-tender United States notes outstanding. These notes will be outstanding, they will be legal-tender notes, they will be greenbacks, they will be upon a perfect par with the present $346,000,000 of greenbacks, and part and parcel of them.

And on and after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem in coin, the United States legal-tender notes then outstanding, on their presentation for redemption at the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States in the city of New York, in sums of not less than $50. And to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and provide for the redemption in this act authorized or required, he is authorized to use any surplus revenues, from time to time, in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to issue, sell, and dispose of at not less than par, in coin, either of the descriptions of bonds of the United States described in the act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," with like qualities, privileges, and exemptions, to the extent necessary to carry this act into full effect, and to use the proceeds thereof for the purposes aforesaid.

Mr. President, that is another reason why I am opposed to this measure. It enables the enemies of silver to gather together the certificates, to take them to the Treasury and demand gold and receive gold, as the Secretaries of the Treasury always have heretofore held that the greenbacks were to be redeemed in gold; and the Secretary of the Treasury purchased and paid for $100,000,000 of gold coin, and it has been in the Treasury Department for the last twelve or fifteen years, upon which the people have been paying 4 per cent. interest on the bonds issued in lieu of it, and it has been kept there, as claimed by every Secretary of the Treasury, for the special redemption of United States legal-tender notes whenever presented for redemption. They never have offered to redeem a greenback in a silver dollar, and under this law whenever the holders of these United States notes go there and demand gold coin, gold coin will be paid to them, and the Treasury will be drained and it will be replenished by the sale of 4 per cent. bonds under that act for the purpose of purchasing additional gold coin.

Mr. TELLER. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Does the Senator from Missouri think that any Administration will have the hardihood to sell bonds of the United States for the purpose he indicates?

Mr. COCKRELL. Well, Mr. President, I think the enemies of silver will have the hardihood to do anything that will break down silver. That is my opinion, that the enemies of silver will do anything they can to break down silver and to strike down one-half of the money of the world.

Mr. TELLER. I agree with the Senator on that; but I should like to ask the Senator what he thinks would become of an Administration that would sell bonds for that purpose.

Mr. COCKRELL. Well, Mr. President, I do not know that they would fare very badly. They might in some places, but when the time of an election came around, then they would have something to soothe the wounded feelings of the masses of the people and make them believe they had done exactly right.

We have seen what has been done under the Bland act. The Secretary of the Treasury could have purchased $4,000,000 per month, but all the Secretaries of the Treasury have peremptorily refused to do it under every Administration, and they have purchased the minimum.

But I have additional objections to this bill. We come now to what is called "the established policy of the United States"—

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. Before the Senator leaves the branch of the question he is discussing, I should like to ask him if these Treasury notes are to be redeemed at all, what would he, suppose he had the making of the law, make them redeemable in.

Mr. COCKRELL. Why, Mr. President, I am not disputing but what the provision is about all that could be put into the bill, that is that they are redeemable in gold, or silver, or redeemable in coin. I would have preferred to put in "redeemable in coin." I confess that under that the Secretary of the Treasury could have exercised the same discretion that he can exercise under the present language.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. In gold or silver coin?

Mr. COCKRELL. As a matter of course.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. The Senator, then, has no criticism of that provision.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have this criticism, that under that a Secretary of the Treasury who is an enemy to silver will exercise the discretion to pay gold only.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. If it were payable in coin, could he not do the same thing?

Mr. COCKRELL. He could do the same thing. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Ohio said the remedy for that was to get a good Secretary of the Treasury. That is true, and in the selection of that distinguished official much will depend in regard to what will be the effects of this bill should it become a law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pursuant to notice heretofore given, the Chair lays before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives; which will be read.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the message is read I would ask if we can not have a vote upon this question.

Mr. COCKRELL. We can not have a vote right now, Mr. President.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE S. S. COX.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions of the House of Representatives will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, April 19, 1890.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. Samuel Sullivan Cox, late a Representative from the State of New York.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a distinguished public servant, the House at the conclusion of these memorial proceedings shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate this resolution to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk be instructed to communicate a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. President, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has received with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the honorable Samuel Sullivan Cox, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of New York, and tenders to the family of the deceased the assurance of sympathy in their sad bereavement.

Resolved, That the business of the Senate be now suspended that opportunity may be given for fitting tributes to the memory of the deceased and to his eminent public and private virtues, and that as a further mark of respect the Senate, at the conclusion of such remarks, shall adjourn.

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to transmit to the family of the deceased a copy of these resolutions.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. President, I first met Mr. Cox after he and I were elected to the Forty-fifth Congress in part to represent the State of New York in the House of Representatives. He then had an established national reputation as a brilliant, able, and versatile orator and conscientious and patriotic legislator. Mr. Cox, sir, was an uncompromising partisan upon those questions that divided the two great political parties during the memorable period that he was in public life, and fully possessed of the courage of his convictions. He never hesitated to champion them or assail with the eloquence, logic, wit, ridicule, and satire at his command—and few men were endowed with his resources—the policy of the opposing party. But in my service with him in the House he received—and it was due him—a large degree of credit for sincerity, worthy motives, and honorable methods, however earnest his attacks were or troublesome to his adversaries.

If I pay this tribute to his memory it will hardly be said that I am too friendly a critic, for in our political faiths we had nothing in common, and never that I now recall approached so near each other and to the party line as to create the suggestion of a sympathy between us. I speak, sir, of party questions alone; upon many others we rarely seriously differed. Representing the same State, both devoted to her service, jealous of her honor, and proud of her history, we were drawn together by the common cause, if it were possible, of adding new luster to her renown, rather than by any natural law of selection, and became personal friends, and thoroughly in harmony in whatever in our public careers was personal to each other. What I mean is that in those struggles that are consummated by the survival of the stronger, if not always the fittest, there was the utmost cordiality, often co-operation and confidences.

It is often said of those occupying the most exalted public positions while living that their vacant places would be so quickly and well filled that the notice of death and the funeral ceremonies would alone advertise the change. There have been marked exceptions to this, and the death of Mr. Cox is one of them.

He was a ready, cogent debater, who always enlisted the interest of his hearers, and he easily maintained the most advanced line of recognized parliamentary leadership in the controversy. His party friends yielded him his position without murmur or jealousy. His opponents recognized it, for to leave him unanswered was an abandonment by them of the contest. He was often so eloquent in the use of language that while he was cogent he strongly appealed to the sympathies, the hearts, and all the noblest and most exalted human sentiments.

Confessedly he was witty and had the most difficult task of maintaining the reputation, and I believe no one has ever in a service of the same length as his coined more witticisms than our friend. His public utterances abounded in illustrations entertaining and instructive. He must have been a great reader of books, and of books generally, for he was always well equipped from those resources. His eloquence, wit, appeals, illustrations, and logic were characterized by a genuine, earnest love for the good, admiration for the great, and the desire to be kind to, considerate of, and improve the moral and material conditions of those in any degree dependent upon legislation or the bounty and guardianship of the nation, and he favored laws which he believed promoted the interest of his countrymen and their moral and intellectual advancement. He was an ever-living spring of love, generous sentiments, and kindly deeds. The sentiment of hate—I mean that hate which is cruel or prompts revenge—was foreign to his nature.

Mr. Cox, though an eloquent orator and able debater, was not a political leader in the sense that a general is a great general. I mean that he was not one of those to whom it seems to be allotted to lead parties, who have followers bearing their names and who seem to lose a distinctive political existence apart from it. He possessed too kind a heart and his nature was too emotional; his taste for literature and its laurels, for travel and its pleasures, his enjoyment of art and all that is loving and lovely and good were too absorbing. He would have starved and died if limited for his enjoyments and pleasures to the victories of a great political organizer. I do not mean by this that he was not strong in leadership when the occasion and time were to his liking, but that all occasions and times did not call him from all other, and to him often more charming, pursuits and more delightful employments.

In the memorial volume will be presented the record of his social, domestic, literary, and political life, spoken by loving and admiring friends. I have not preferred to dwell upon them, but rather upon his, to me, most charming character and accomplishments. I said earlier, his absence will be missed and marked. Memorial exercises, funeral orations, and eulogiums are unnecessary to remind us that he has left his accustomed place in our social life, parliamentary leadership, and the service of his country, and that it is still vacant.

Mr. President, we will strew flowers upon his grave; each one must be rich and perfect in tints and shades, and with its own peculiar perfume, each symbolizing purity, love, grace, lofty aspiration or holy inspiration, and voicing an appropriate sentiment. Appropriate flowers have always been messengers of affection and regard; as such we lay these upon his grave.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, more than the third of a century has passed away since Samuel Sullivan Cox sprang full-armed and equipped into the arena of public life and achieved a national reputation. He was first elected to Congress in the portentous, ill-boding year of 1856, and at once took his place as a leader in the debates which sectionalism then for the first time conjured into a bloody and fatal meaning over the organization and condition of the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska, and the dangerous and far-reaching questions incident thereto. From that time until the 10th day of September last, when he fell asleep on earth to wake in eternity, his career was continuously before the public eye as if under a calcium light, and it was at all times brilliant, fascinating, able, instructive, and under all circumstances as free from stain, speck, or blemish as the official life of Cato, the Roman censor.

Sir, in many respects the career of Mr. Cox was remarkable and without a parallel in the history of American affairs. Born in the Valley of the Mississippi, he attained high eminence there, and then, instead of following the westward-moving star of empire which usually guides the way for American ambition in quest of new fields of action and of triumph, he turned his face to the East and sought the oldest, the strongest, and the most competitive center of American civilization. The great Commonwealth of Ohio has furnished forth many of her native sons to other States for the public service, and is now furnishing the President of the United States and two of the most important members of his Cabinet, together with six members of the United States Senate; but Mr. Cox was the first and only one to go to an older and abler empire State than his own, and there to win a lofty civic distinction and be crowned with the evergreen laurel of imperishable honor and fame.

Ohio and New York may exult together over the successful and beneficent labors of his active and useful life, and together they may bend in sorrow over his untimely grave. The official record shows that he was elected four times to Congress from Ohio and twelve times from New York. No other such record as this can be found in the history of our Government, and we instinctively turn to the theater where he so long appeared, in order to study some of the leading elements of a character which commanded such success and such unwaivered popular approval. If it is true that a man is known by the company he keeps, then indeed Mr. Cox must take very high rank from the beginning to the end of his service in the House. He kept company in debate on the greatest questions with the ablest intellects of their day and generation. He was in every race, from start to finish, with those who were swiftest and of best endurance.

Passing over the Thirty-fifth and Thirty-sixth Congresses, in which he distinguished himself in debate on the Douglas side of the Leecompton question, with many of the strongest men from the South, he rises to my mind and memory here to-day as he appeared when we first met as members of the Thirty-seventh Congress at its called session, on the 4th of July, 1861. Sir, how distant and awful that period appears to us, looking back upon it now, as we sit here in the soft, sweet sunlight of peace and union. It towers up seemingly as a far-off volcanic height, once fraught with destruction, but now extinct and only enveloped in the haze and mist and vapor of sad and bygone memories.

There was a turbulent spirit abroad when the Thirty-seventh Congress was chosen, and every intelligent mind discovered danger in 1860 as certainly as the experienced mariner discovers the deadly storm when it is swiftly coming up. It is the philosophy of political communities, as shown by the history of the human race, that agitations arising from deep-seated causes never fail to put strong men in the front lines of action—sometimes their strength already known, but more frequently developed, or, rather, manifested, after being assigned to their positions. This was eminently true of the period from 1860 to 1865 in this country, and to a certain extent it was true of the Thirty-seventh Congress. Into that body came men apparently fashioned and adapted by nature to such a crisis; and others of the same mold and stamp, but more fully developed by the startling events of the times, came afterward, and more numerous, into the Thirty-eighth Congress.

Into the Thirty-seventh Congress came Thaddeus Stevens, then in his old age called for the first time to enact a mighty part in human affairs for which the hand of nature had especially equipped him. Never in all history, I think, has there been such a leader on the floor of a parliamentary body. Not in the history of the Grecian or Roman democracies, when most ruled and guided by popular favorites, nor amidst the civil wars of England, can there be found a character so dominant over others without any reliance whatever upon the sword. Stevens had no need to resort to a vulgar violation or abuse of the rules of the House in order to establish his supremacy.

He ruled his party majority and thus ruled the House by the force of a giant intellect, combined with an iron will, and sometimes set on fire by those tremendous passions of the human heart which rage when the tempest rages, direct the whirlwind, and outride the utmost fury of the storm. Often while watching his wonderful displays of power over the House I have busied myself in taking up in review the various leaders of the French Revolution, and wondering which one he would most nearly have resembled had he lived and acted through those convulsive scenes. My mind always inclined to Danton for a comparison, and yet with only a partial assent. They were alike in their power, by brief impassioned speech, to stir the blood of men and to impel them to action like a bugle-call to battle. They were alike in their mental superiority, their stormy tempers, and the gloomy vein of misanthropy which beset them; but there the comparison seems to end.

The American was more sincere and filled with more definite and nobler purposes than the Frenchman. Though Danton died of the guillotine, yet with his dying words he sneered at the cause for which his noble head, a moment later, fell in the dust. Stevens had great aims in view from the first, and he pursued them unsparingly. The destruction of slavery and the downfall of the political power which it upheld were the supreme objects of his life and inspired him, not so much with love for the slave as with hatred toward the people of his own race who inherited the negro in bondage and had the care of him. He lived to witness the fulfillment of his dearest wishes, and was then laid down to rest, according to his own directions, in the colored churchyard at his old home.

Owen Lovejoy was also a member of the Thirty-seventh Congress, a man of powerful and inflammatory eloquence, hot and bitter in his political convictions, and animated in his hostility to the South by a personal grievance in the death of a brother at Alton, Ill. The names of Roscoe Conkling, Schnyler Colfax, Henry J. Raymond, Francis Thomas of Maryland, John F. Farnsworth, and others of high ability and national standing might be cited and dwelt upon to show the strength and resources of the overwhelming majority in the House at that time.

At a later day and into the Thirty-eighth Congress came Garfield, with his industrious, scholarly methods and almost boyish enthusiasm; Blaine, with whose brilliant, Prince Rupert style of parliamentary warfare we are all familiar, and Schenck, who, in my opinion, was the best real debater of the actual matter in hand of them all, the hardest and most direct bitter in short, turn-about speeches, and the fairest and readiest in recognizing the force of his adversary's blows. Sir, it was in company and in combat with these men and others more or less like them that Mr. Cox was to be found for nearly thirty years of his life. How well he bore himself through it all, sans peur, sans reproche, the voluminous records amply disclose, and even his opponents have always testified.

If called upon to point out to the emulating young men of the country the traits of character which most conduced to Mr. Cox's great success, I would say that, aside from his high order of natural ability, he was most indebted to an undaunted courage and a never-wearying industry. These two qualities brought him into every conflict always ready and never afraid. He read everything with a marvelous faculty for the rejection of the chaff, the husks, and the shells, and for the assimilation of all else to his own use. He kept scrap-books on all subjects, and his drawers, not only at his home, but in his desk at the House, were well stored magazines of fixed ammunition for any and all sorts of political conflict.

He always approached an important and hotly contested discussion in the House with a joyous and confident air, and his friends never dreaded the result when they saw him rise and turn to his opponents with the light of battle in his face. He shrank from no odds and never balked to count the number or the quality of his adversaries. He relied on the justice of his own cause and the strength of his own preparations, and then, with the steady and splendid courage of a knight in the days of the tournament of old, he met the chosen and the ablest champions that were sent against him. His was in every respect an intrepid nature. He was a brave man, mentally, morally, and physically. He laughed at danger in its face.

In the history of Henry of Navarre it is written that within the first hour of his birth his jubilant Gascon grandfather perfumed his infant lips with the clove and wet them with wine, in order, as he said, that the royal-blooded child might, when he grew to manhood, have within his breast a bold and, at the same time, a gay and mirthful heart. And so in other instances, without the clove and the wine, hearts have been filled with courage and with the sunshine of mirth and humor, and have borne themselves in every manly conflict of life with as much gallantry and true chivalry as he who wore the white plume and bade his soldiers follow it as their oriflamme.

Mr. Cox was often criticised during his lifetime, and by those who thought thus to injure him, because he was a partisan in his political faith and action. His critics were mistaken, not in the fact that he was a partisan in the fullest and best sense of that term, but in assuming that such a fact was injurious to his career for usefulness, to his character as a lover of his kind, or to his reputation and standing with all honorable men of whatever party, persuasion, or creed of belief and practice. He did indeed believe in the party to which he belonged, and defended its principles in the open arena against all comers. May I not ask, however, whether much respect is due to any one in public life who does less than this?

Political parties are absolute necessities in free governments. They are the only methods known to the wisdom and experience of enlightened history whereby concentration of thought, agreement of opinion, unity of purpose, and concert of action can be secured for the accomplishment of great results. Errors may creep into party organizations, but their cure lies in that general spirit and purpose of reform which inspires the honest membership of all parties, rather than in an outcry against the existence of the parties themselves.

In every struggle for liberty among the Greeks and the Romans, in every contest for the enlargement and security of popular rights in England or anywhere else in modern Europe, and in all the mighty movements and convulsions which have taken place for freedom in this western hemisphere, the leaders of the people have simply been the leaders of great political parties and have accomplished all their vast and glorious results through compact, unified, and aggressive political organizations. Washington himself was a leader in civil life of the Whig party against the party of the Tories, and but for this fact would not have been chosen to command the armies of the Revolution. Jefferson and Jackson were party men, and so, likewise, were Lincoln and Grant. It is the small man, not the great, who deems himself wiser than the associated wisdom of his times, and who in official station distends himself out of all proportion with the idea that he is stronger, greater, and knows more than the party which created and elevated him.

But as we recall and dwell for a moment on Mr. Cox's grand loyalty and adherence to his party and its policies, how broad and comprehensive appear the whole tenor and spirit of his life and conduct; how like universal sunshine on growing fields and blooming flowers, his warm philanthropy, his active benevolence, his generous, helpful deeds shine forth in every line of his public service! Liberality was the law of his being; his soul was lit up with love for the brotherhood of man, and no narrow or selfish thought or purpose ever darkened its chambers. He never had any doubt who was his neighbor or of the meaning of the golden rule.

Had he been on the road between Jerusalem and Jericho when the stranger was found stripped, wounded, and half dead, he would have relieved the Samaritan of the task of furnishing oil and wine, of binding up wounds, and of paying the stranger's bill in advance for proper care at the inn. Henry Clay filled the civilized world with the music of his eloquence in sympathy with the oppressed Greeks in 1824. It is not too much to say that Samuel S. Cox, in recent years, with wider information on his subject, greater knowledge of the different races of the earth, and with a braver and loftier benevolence than was required of the great Kentuckian, challenged the attention of his own countrymen and of all nations to the brutal and barbaric treatment of the downtrodden Hebrews of Poland and throughout all the vast, dark, and hopeless regions of Russian despotism.

His powerful and eloquent protest aroused public opinion, quickened consciences, and put ancient, blind prejudice to shame in every enlightened land beneath the sun, so that now the sons and daughters of Israel in the dominions of the Czar and elsewhere are safer and happier because of the words he spoke and the expression he secured in the American Congress. His heart went out to helpless and suffering people, and he visited those who were sick and in prison. His bold, determined, and efficient efforts in behalf of an exchange of prisoners during the most resentful and deadliest period of the war between the North and the South will not only be enshrined forever in the archives of his Government, but they have also been written to his credit by the recording angel in that high realm where the blue and the gray are alike liberated from prisons and from pain and where they have already welcomed the coming of their common benefactor.

While Mr. Cox discussed amply and upon full preparation every question within the entire range of government, State and national, yet it will be found by the student of history that his most conspicuous labors and his most eloquent and impassioned speech were in behalf of those who were helpless to labor for themselves. When the war of the sections was over and the South was a wreck; when her States were torn from their foundations and demolished as cities are by cyclones; when her people were bankrupt, disfranchised, and standing amidst their ruined homes with nothing left save the inextinguishable honor, courage, and recuperative energies which belong to a heroic and glorious race, then it was that Mr. Cox seemed to gather a new inspiration, and he flung himself into the tremendous debates which followed on reconstruction and kindred questions with the learning and versatility of Burke, the polished wit of Sheridan, and the fiery, impassioned logic of Douglas.

He who now or hereafter most carefully and impartially examines the debates in the House during the first ten years after the war will most fully concur in the estimate I make of Mr. Cox's power and resources in parliamentary warfare. He had supported the Government in its efforts to suppress the rebellion; he had voted men and money without stint or limit; but when the vanquished were at the mercy of power and the legions of Lee and Stonewall Jackson were scattered to fight no more forever, he took the side of those who were voiceless here in their own behalf; he espoused the cause of the weak, and held over their heads, to protect them from further blows, a shield stronger, more impenetrable, and more glorious than was forged and wrought by Vulcan for Achilles—the shield of the Constitution.

The restoration of the States, and not their reconstruction and readmission into the Union from which they had no power to secede, was his policy of statesmanship for that anomalous period. He believed the honor of the Southern people could be trusted in their relations with the Federal Government, and he was therefore in favor of rehabilitating them at once in all their former rights as American citizens, subject simply to the elimination of slavery. There are those who believe that Mr. Lincoln, had he lived, would have pursued substantially such a policy, and they also believe that the most disastrous results of his horrible and untimely death were the reconstruction and military occupation of the Southern States growing out of the supreme distrust and hostility at that time between the legislative and executive departments of the Government.

Turning to other subjects which engaged the thought and action of Mr. Cox in his public service, the same broad and liberal principles of benevolent statesmanship are to be found in his works on every hand. To his constant and unwearied efforts, persisted in for years and enriched with vast information and thrilling eloquence, the present splendid life-saving system of our Government owes its existence and its humane and heroic career. When the hardy mariner mans the life-boat and goes to the rescue of the shipwrecked and tempest-tossed on the angry ocean, the spirit of this brilliant, comprehensive, and benevolent American statesman will be with him as a pilot on the waters; and when drowning men and women are carried from the raging surf and resuscitated on the beach their first conscious thought may well be one of thankfulness and gratitude that he lived and labored so usefully and so well.

It is hardly necessary to say that Mr. Cox had quick, keen, and tender sympathies with such as are known as the plain, common people. He sincerely loved them, enjoyed their ways, believed in their virtues, and often talked with them in their neighborhood dialects. Daniel O'Connell, in his palmiest days, when Irish multitudes shouted with mirth or burst into tears at his will, never got nearer in heart, love, and sympathy to his audiences than did the gifted orator whose death we mourn to-day. The people on their part, when brought in personal contact with him, especially as their Representative, made him their political idol. I once witnessed a scene in illustration of this fact which will never fade from my memory.

More than twenty years ago I was taking part in a memorable political campaign in Ohio, in which Thurman, Vallandigham, Pendleton, and other gentlemen of great note were likewise engaged. Judge Thurman was a candidate for governor, and although defeated by a few votes for that position he secured a Legislature which gave him a seat in this body and thus enriched American history by his great and imperishable services as a Senator. Mr. Cox had removed from Ohio and was then living in New York, but was called to Zanesville by a death in his family circle, which, of course, prevented his participation in the canvass then at a high stage of excitement and activity.

During his melancholy sojourn of a few days at Zanesville he concluded to run down to Columbus, and it so happened that Mr. Pendleton, Mr. Vallandigham, and myself were on the train with him. It was not generally known that Mr. Cox was then in the State, and least of all was he expected at Columbus that day. When the train arrived a concourse of people, with music and banners, was at the depot to welcome those of the party who were expected, when, as we emerged from the cars, all at once an intent look came into every eye in that multitude, and then a jubilant, prolonged shout rent the air. The brilliant Buckeye was discovered by his old neighbors and constituents, and in an instant everybody was forgotten but him. It was his first return after going out from their midst and taking up a new home. He managed to get from the cars to a carriage, but loving hands lifted him out of it.

I have witnessed many an ovation to popular party leaders, but never anything like the intense personal devotion, affection, and love displayed on this occasion. The last I saw of him many hours afterward was as he stood bareheaded in the street, surrounded by a surging multitude of men, women, and children, who were shouting, laughing, crying, and clinging to him. His own eyes were suffused, his face was pale, and his lips trembled, though wreathed with smiles of rapture at his unexpected and wonderful welcome. Often in afteryears he and I talked over this scene together, and the memory of it remained a joy to his heart to the latest day of his life.

If we leave Mr. Cox's official public life and at this point turn to other fields and forums, we find him there displaying the same rare ability, the same amazing rapidity of thought and action which made him the commanding figure he was as a tribune of the people in the halls of legislation. The range of his information on all subjects was more extensive and more accurate than that of any other man I have ever known who was engaged in political life and in affairs of state. Nothing once appropriated to his mental storehouse ever escaped him or failed to be used at the proper time.

Whether in company with professors, scientists, authors, travelers, playwrights, eminent actors, humorists, or with statesmen, jurists, and law-givers, he was equally at home, and equally ready to contribute something useful, brilliant, and instructive. He paid tribute to the memory of savants such as Morse, Agassiz, and Henry with the learning and in the language of one of their own class. On the lecture platform, when he chose to ascend it, he had no superior in the richness and strength of his matter or in the eloquence with which it was delivered.

I once heard him address the literary societies of one of the leading universities of the country on the practical details of chemistry as applied to the physical sciences, and it was interesting to observe two professors of chemistry watching with notebook and pencil in hand to detect him in a technical blunder, a false quantity, an erroneous combination, or a faulty result, and watching in vain, as they afterward admitted, with great surprise and admiration. He was a writer of wonderful beauty and grace. He wrote and published books which sparkle like gems in the literary world, and which will continue to delight and instruct generations yet to come. He loved art, and befriended artists by liberal legislation and by his magnetic personal sympathy and encouragement.

In statuary and painting his taste was simply the unerring instinct of his own lofty genius, and he frequented with enthusiasm the galleries and museums where the works of the masters displayed their greatest beauties and glories to his eye. He was at the front in every movement looking to the cultivation, refinement, and progress of the people. He believed in the educating and elevating influences of libraries, and hence gave the sanction of his name and of his abilities to that great structure now rising in its strength and beauty in front of this Capitol, there to stand as a home for the books of the world, as a depository for the mental product of the human race, and as a monument to the enlightened spirit, the grace, and the culture of the American Republic at the close of the nineteenth century.

In the midst of all his home labors, pursuits, and duties, Mr. Cox also found time to take rank as one of the most extensive and intelligent travelers of modern times. With her at his side who had joined her name and fortune to his in the Valley of the Muskingum, in the bright morning of youth, he repeatedly journeyed over Europe, Asia, and Africa, and always returned with the spoils of useful knowledge and an increased love for his own land.

With the eye of a philosopher and with a soul filled with the poetry and sublimity of high historic associations, he saw almighty Rome, climbed the Pyramids, and stood upon Mount Calvary. He traversed deserts on the camel's back, and camped at nightfall with the Bedouin at long-sought wells of fresh water. He floated on the waters of the Nile, and plucked the lotus, the Egyptians' symbol of the creation. He marked the course of the Euphrates; looked upon the Red Sea where Pharaoh attempted to cross in pursuit of fugitive slaves; drank from the river Jordan, and slept by the cooling fountains of Damascus. He studied every variety of the human race in the broad spirit of a human brotherhood, and no prejudice of caste or of color darkened his vision or perverted his judgment as he wandered amongst the motley and scattered tribes of the earth's most distant parts.

But wherever he traveled and in whatever clime he sojourned what a staunch and genuine American he was! The sunbeams of the Orient, the soft skies of Italy, the grandest scenery of the Alps, were not so attractive or sublime to him as the face of nature in his own Western home. After gliding on the waters of the Blue Danube and along the castellated heights of the Rhine, he was wont to say that the Hudson between Albany and New York and the Ohio from Steubenville to Cincinnati presented more beauty to the eye of the traveler than any other rivers in the world. John Milton is quoted as saying "Our country is wherever we are well off."

This was peculiarly untrue with Mr. Cox. Cosmopolite as he was in his philosophy and in his broad love of humanity, yet he was not a citizen of the world in the sense that weakened the ties that bound him to American institutions, to the American people, and to the American flag.

Sir, such a character as I have here but imperfectly delineated must take and hold a front place in the history of his country. His works were durable contributions to the cause of human progress, and they can not perish. Their influences will bide the test of time and will go on forever. Who are entitled to be called great by the pen of the historian? Who merit most the grateful remembrance of posterity? Let statues and monuments continue to arise in honor of warriors who gathered fame on battle-fields, but let it not be accepted by the public mind that they alone are to occupy the Walhalla of the brave, the palace of immortality.

There are other fields besides those of war where high courage and capacity are displayed, where heroes achieve victories full of blessings and full of glory, and where immortal fame attends the efforts of those who live and labor for justice, liberty, and equality in behalf of their fellow-men. In such fields as these, fields of laborious thought, philanthropic purposes, and lofty mental conflict, Mr. Cox won for himself a place on an easy level with those whom the world has crowned with civic greatness, and to him also belongs, and will be conceded, the same recognition.

But while yet in full career, in the midst of plans, hopes, and comprehensive purposes for the future, borne forward by all his ceaseless activity, and in the unabated prime and vigor of all his splendid faculties, he was called by a voice for which we are all listening and which none can disobey. He responded with the manly courage of his nature, and in starting on his last journey, this time to cross, not the ocean channels which merely divide continents and hemispheres, but the realms which lay between time and eternity, his only regret was the separation from his devoted and gifted wife, who from youth to age had been his fellow-traveler, his companion, his comfort, his beloved. He felt that he had not been a slothful servant nor a loiterer in the vineyard, and that all the ends he had aimed at had been his country's, his God's, and truth's.

Not a line he ever wrote, not a word he ever uttered called for change or apology in the interest of morals, patriotism, or religion. He had always believed with Solomon that a good name was rather to be chosen than great riches, and though he was a conspicuous and influential figure during periods reeking with venality and corruption his record at every step and at the close was as white and clean as the falling snow. May we not hope and believe that his good life goes on and his great talents continue to expand in knowledge and in power in a world where life is eternal? Within less than a year before his final summons came he talked with me of the midnight sun he once witnessed in the polar regions of the North.

With eyes glowing and face lit up, he described the great luminary of day swinging low at midnight's still, weird hour, and touching apparently with its burning rim the dark waters of the Arctic, but never disappearing beneath them. He painted with all the poet's fervor and beauty its emergence from the shadowy and awe-inspiring aspect of its lowest point, and the rich and joyous effulgence with which it blazed forth again as it ascended the sky. In another sphere, more radiant and more restful than this, he has beheld another sun which never sets and in whose light his soul has realized the full fruition of christian faith and christian works.

Associate and delight of my earlier and later years, joy and charm of every hour we ever spent together, faithful and beloved friend of a lifetime, farewell! Hail, and farewell until we meet again!

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the death-roll of public men is lengthening with unusual rapidity, so that now but few remain of those who shared in the exciting and dangerous scenes in Congress preceding the civil war. The death of Mr. Cox strikes from the list of the living one conspicuous actor in those scenes, and now it becomes my duty, as one of the few survivors, to pay a brief but just tribute to the qualities of head and heart that made him and kept him a leader among the public men of our country for a period of more than thirty-three years, longer than the average life of a generation. This duty is the more imperative upon me as he was a native of Ohio, for forty years a resident, and for eight years a Representative in Congress from that State, honored and respected by all of whatever party or creed, and beloved by his associates as but few in political life can hope to be.

I can also speak of him from a longer personal acquaintance than any one in either House, for I have known him or his kindred from almost the days of my boyhood. We were born in neighboring counties, he one year later than I. My father and his were associated as judge and clerk of the supreme court of Ohio. I knew of him as early as 1853, as the editor of the Ohio Statesman, a Democratic paper published at Columbus, the organ of that party in Ohio, but my personal acquaintance and association with him commenced with his election in 1856 as a member of the House of Representatives. His distinguished career in public life since that time has been eloquently stated by Senators who have preceded me. I prefer to speak of him as I think of him, as he appeared in social life, as a companion, a traveler, a writer of history, and of almost every form of literary composition.

While Mr. Cox was a successful leader in political life and rendered his party due fealty on purely political questions, he was not always in harmony with the majority of his party. In his first speech in Congress and the first speech made in the new Hall of the House of Representatives, an opportunity carefully chosen by him with the skill of an actor, he took ground against the Lecompton constitution, strongly recommended by Mr. Buchanan's Administration. He supported several measures during the war not approved by his political associates. He spoke in favor of the amendment abolishing slavery, though he did not vote for it. By instinct, education, and association, especially by family ties, he was against slavery. On all other questions of a political character he was by inheritance, and no doubt by conviction, a Democrat, and faithfully followed the tenets of his party. I do not consider this a fault, but a virtue.

While honesty of purpose and motive should be conceded to all parties and sects, it is no discredit to even the wisest of men to yield his individual opinions to the deliberate conviction of the great body of the people with whom in the main he agreed in order to secure a common purpose or desire. The right to protest and discuss and even to secede from a party or sect is open to every individual and should be exercised when clear and honest conviction demands it, but such conviction is more frequently caused by chagrin, disappointment, or egotism than by sober reason. It is enough to say of Mr. Cox that he was an honest partisan, but neither a bitter nor revengeful one. He was a Democrat, but he knew that the great party to which he was opposed was as strong and faithful in their support of the rights of the people as the party to which he belonged, but they differed as to the best means to secure these rights.

We constantly forget in our political contests that the great body of the questions we have to decide are non-political. Upon these we divide without feeling and without question of motives. On all such questions Mr. Cox was always on the humanitarian side. He has linked his name in honorable association with many humane, kindly, and reformatory laws. If not the founder or father of our Life-Saving Service, he was at least its guardian and guide. He took an active part in promoting measures of conciliation after the war. He supported the policy of the homestead law against the veto of Mr. Buchanan. He was the advocate of liberal compensation to letter-carriers, of reducing the hours of labor, and of liberal pensions to Union soldiers. I doubt if there is a single measure on the statute-books, during his time, which appeals to sympathy, charity, justice, and kindness for the poor, the distressed, or the unfortunate which did not receive his hearty support. If kindness bestowed is never lost, then Mr. Cox has left an inheritance to thousands who will revere his memory while life lasts.

Perhaps his most pleasing trait was his genial, social manner. Always gay, cheerful, and humorous, he scattered flowers on the pathway of all his friends and acquaintances. His wit was free from sting. If in the excitement of debate he inflicted pain, he was ready and prompt to heal the wound, and died, as far as I know, without an enemy or an unhealed feud. I had with him more than one political debate and controversy, but they left no coolness or irritation. In my last conversation with him, in the spring of 1889, we talked of old times and early scenes more than thirty years past and gone, and he recalled them only to praise those who differed with him. He had malice for none, but charity for all. In that endearing tie of husband and wife, which, more than any other, tests the qualities of a man, both he and his wife were models of unbroken affection and constant help for each other.

The most enduring fame of Mr. Cox will not rest upon what he said in Congress or did in Congress. His speeches are buried in the vast mausoleum of CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS. But few will take the pains to select the wheat from the chaff, and what he did will be forgotten with the generation of which he was a part. His fame will rest mainly upon his numerous writings in many fields of literature. This was the occupation in which he took most delight. He was bred a lawyer, but he early abandoned his profession and became an editor of a political paper. Nor did he devote his time to political questions, but soon became distinguished as a brilliant writer on purely literary topics. One of his pen pictures—a model of its class—gave him the name of "Sunset Cox," of which he was never ashamed.

He was fond of travel and wrote several books descriptive of scenes and incidents of travel. He also wrote historical works. He entered as an author, a lecturer, and a speaker many fields of research, and in all sustained his reputation as a brilliant writer and speaker, always interesting and often eloquent, a close student who always mastered his subject, and withal a man of generous impulses, kind and cheerful nature, a true friend, and a faithful public servant. This all can be said truly and without exaggeration of Mr. Cox. All that is left for me is to express my sincere sorrow for his untimely death. He did not contemplate death when I saw him last. His death was the first news I received on my arrival in New York, in September last, from a journey abroad. I am told that he met the common fate of all with patient confidence and an assured hope and belief in the doctrines of the Christian faith and the promise of future life.

It is fortunate that man can not know the future, and especially that future beyond human life. Socrates, when condemned to death, consoled himself with the inconceivable happiness, in a future state, when he would converse and associate with and question the mighty array of heroes, patriots, and sages that preceded him. He said to his judges, "It is now time to depart—for me to die, for you to live. But which of us is going to a better state is unknown to every one but God." We can not lift the veil, but may we not share the hope of the wisest of men that our farewell to associates who go before us is but a brief parting for a better life?

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to speak at length of the public life of Samuel S. Cox. To do so would simply be to present a résumé of the political history of this country for the last thirty years. When I came to the Senate twelve years ago my first public duty of any importance was service upon a joint committee of the Senate and House of Representatives, to inquire into the causes of the decay of the American merchant marine. During my service upon that committee, of which Mr. Cox was a member from the House of Representatives, I came to know him well, and personal and political sympathy caused our acquaintance to rapidly ripen into earnest friendship.

He was in some respects the most remarkable man I have known in public affairs. Whilst there was nothing majestic or rugged in his nature, he was beyond question better adapted to public life as known to the American people than any other man in all my acquaintance. He was capable of indefatigable labor, with varied accomplishments, versatile talents, wonderful eloquence, and a tenacity of purpose which knew nothing like failure. He was a partisan, but a partisan in the highest and best meaning of the term. He fought for his party because the principles of that party were, in his judgment, necessary to the welfare of his country. He never shrank from any political hazard, from any political contest. There was not a rivet in his armor that had not been tried by thrust of sword and point of spear. All that he was, all that he could give, was unreservedly and without hesitation devoted to the principles and policy of the great organization of which he was so illustrious a member.

He was a man of mercurial temperament, with whom the lights and shadows came and went as on a summer landscape, and like all public men of intellect and labor he tired at times and almost despaired. In 1884, when I heard that he contemplated accepting the mission to Turkey, I called upon him as a personal friend and remonstrated against it. I urged upon him the necessity, with a Democratic Administration coming into power after a quarter of a century, for our best talent and most experienced leaders in both branches of Congress, and I placed before him the great crisis that in the history of our party demanded his presence in the House of Representatives.

His answer was pathetic. He said "I am tired; tired almost unto death. I am tired of rolling this eternal stone up the hill to see it roll back again to the bottom. I am tired of this eternal toil without return. I am tired of the excitement, of it seems to me, the fruitless public labor that has been my lot for so many years. I want rest, and I can find it amidst the mosques and minarets of the finished civilization of the East. I can find it in the land of sunshine and flowers, completed centuries ago, where I can dream away the balance of this life, so much of which has been spent in toil and excitement." The year afterwards I received from him a letter stating that he had been disappointed in the East and would return soon to the United States, and I welcomed him back to public life as a soldier welcomes a comrade whose blade he knows is never absent in the hour of trial and danger.

I was the cause, to some extent, of the first address he delivered in the House of Representatives after his return, and it was in connection with legislation affecting the Yellowstone National Park. We agreed to meet there the summer afterwards. I was prevented by circumstances beyond my control from keeping the engagement, but I met him after he came out of that splendid reservation at Helena, Mont., and there we talked, under the shadow of the great mountains, of the past and the coming future. We then anticipated our meeting again at the assembling of the present Congress. But, Mr. President, he has gone to a higher congress, whose sessions are eternal.

The history of Mr. Cox will always be connected not only with the politics of this country, but with objects of the highest and noblest philanthropy. My friend from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] has spoken of his splendid oratory in behalf of the Jews of Poland. He also devoted many years to those who "go down to the sea in ships," and to the humble postman, who brings tidings of joy or sorrow to each household in the land.

After his return from the Pacific coast I received from him the last of his literary productions, The Isles of the Princes; or, the Pleasures of Prinkipo, and in the closing words of this charming book, which seems in every page to breathe the genius, the philanthropy, and the vivacity of this wonderful man, a fitting epitaph is found for his tomb. This is an account of his last summer abroad, on the island of Prinkipo, where with the companion of his life's journey he attempted to realize that dream of complete rest for which he had left his country:

The story of our summer is told. The wreaths begin to wither on the tomb. A thousand thoughts and studies hang over them. But these are not dead garlands. The angels of memory will resume their places at the gate of this paradise. The flaming sword drives us into the old and busy world, under the glaring sun and the uncolored heat and dust of our earnest and active American life; but amidst all the turmoil and worry of that life, we shall turn to the "Pleasures of Prinkipo."

In the shadow of thy pines, by the shores of thy sea,
On the hills of thy beauty, our heart is with thee.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, a strong personal attachment, at first inspired by many kind attentions long ago, impels me to offer the tribute of affectionate regard to the distinguished dead. Many years his junior I was attracted to Mr. Cox by such thoughtful consideration as men of experience and years can show to those much younger than themselves. In the kindness and friendliness of his life he exerted such a winning influence on those with whom he came in contact that he made friends of young and old.

From the time Samuel Sullivan Cox entered Brown University until just previous to his death, when he wrote "I am beginning to yearn after early memories of Brown and Providence," he had a great fondness for that venerable institution and the city where it stands. There it was he early displayed those brilliant qualities of mind that in after-years made him renowned, there it was his youthful powers were cultivated, bent, and trained, and there it was, as I have often heard him say, he acquired that analytic habit that became a part of his intellectual power. Then and there it was he formed associations in Rhode Island that ended only with his life.

Very naturally after leaving college his tastes led him to devote himself to a professional career, and he practiced law in Zanesville, Ohio, his native town, until 1853, when he moved to Columbus and became editor of the Columbus Statesman; then turning his attention to politics he soon entered public life.

Always a strong partisan, he bore a conspicuous part in the councils of the Democratic party; yet when necessary to do what he considered right he could step across the party line. I leave all commendation for party fealty to his party associates. It was by no means on account of his political affiliation that his closest personal friends were bound to him.

In his public career, extending through so many years, where he won an enviable national reputation (his first election to the House of Representatives from Ohio was in 1856, and after removing to New York he was elected from a New York City district to the House almost successively until his death), there is much to allure attention and attract remark.

Sensitive to the blows and thrusts of factional animosity, he shrank from the keen rancor that has become too common a part of public debate and difference. He would naturally "beware of entrance to a quarrel, but being in" his abilities, his mental resources, and his ready wit made him a bold and fearless adversary. Mr. Cox never entered into any contest bearing malice, and if surprised into a loss of temper or suddenly excited to hot words he was prompt to express regret and ask for that forgiveness he was ever ready to bestow.

When a man has been standing for many years in the fierce light of political controversy it is generally forgotten that he has any individuality, private life, or character except such character as has been imposed upon him by political allies or opponents.

But, sir, personal characteristics drew friends to Mr. Cox; his individuality kept that friendship. While others laud his statesmanship and commend his public acts, I would pay my humble tribute to the man himself and to those qualities and characteristics that won him friends.

In all his relations with men Mr. Cox was benevolent and kind; always accessible to the unfortunate. Interested in works of charity, he was so ready with his kindly aid that when opportunity presented an occasion to do good, with earnest zeal he would devote himself to the kind purpose, whether that purpose was directed toward the establishment of a national system for life-saving on the sea and coast or was only secretly called forth by the pitiful recital of some individual distress. It was not alone on account of his generous readiness to aid the unfortunate that friends were drawn to him, for in his intercourse with those whose ample fortunes and full stores of this world's goods left no material want he could supply, this cheerful, genial man daily added to the number of his friends, and all through this broad land of ours his name was known and in almost every little town he had at least one friend.

In the city where he lived, so greatly was he honored and esteemed that when he died a vast assemblage of his fellow-townsmen met to pay to him the homage of their respect and love. That gathering was a grander tribute to the worth and goodness of the man than all the adulation and heartless solemnity of stately ceremonials in high places.

Mr. Cox had cultivated by studious application the strong and vigorous mind he had inherited, had expanded his powers by extensive travel, and stored in a retentive memory what he had read and seen. Gifted with an ease and felicity of expression he became a frequent and most interesting contributor to periodical publications, and was the author of many entertaining books, infusing into each the cheerfulness of his bright mind.

To all appearance he had just reached the summit of his mental strength; he seemed adequately equipped to undertake still more laborious tasks. Never had he been so well fitted to serve his constituency and his country. In the full possession of his ripened powers he did not perceive that age was coming on. To his full hope the end seemed still far distant, but the days of his appointed time were numbered, and on the 10th day of September last Samuel Sullivan Cox entered into rest.

An active, earnest, noble life has ended. Another pilgrim had made the journey to that—

Country bordering on this land
Sealed in eternal silence here, where all
Are journeying—a region which we call
The empire of the dead. No mortal's hand
Hath ever mapped its coast. Upon its strand
Discovery's anchor ne'er hath been let fall.

[Mr. EVARTS addressed the Senate. See Appendix.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] that the resolutions which have been read by the Secretary be adopted.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. EVARTS. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, July 9, 1890, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, July 8, 1890.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will cause the Journal of yesterday's proceedings to be read.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, the business we have under consideration, as well as that we are about to take up, is so important to the country that I think we ought to have a quorum; and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER, after counting the House, announced the presence of 122 members; less than a quorum.

Mr. McKINLEY. I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll; when the following members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. The Clerk informs the Chair that 198 members, a quorum, are present.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

WITHDRAWAL AND ANNOUNCEMENT OF CONFEREES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announced by mistake conferees on House bill 9104. The bill was not in a condition for such appointment, and the Chair desires to withdraw the announcement, and in lieu thereof to announce the following conferees on Senate bill No. 209, to authorize the Secretary of War to cause to be mustered William P. Atwell: Messrs. OSBORNE, LANSING, and LANHAM.

ADMISSION OF WYOMING.

The Speaker laid before the House the following bill with Senate amendments:

A bill (H. R. 982) to provide for the admission of the State of Wyoming into the Union, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, June 27, 1890.

Resolved, That the bill from the House of Representatives (H. R. 982) do pass with the following amendment:

Page 2, line 3, after "beginning," insert:

"Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall repeal or affect any act of Congress relating to the Yellowstone National Park or the reservation of the park as now defined, or as may be hereafter defined or extended, or the power of the United States over it; and nothing contained in this act shall interfere with the right and ownership of the United States in said park and reservation as it now is or may hereafter be defined or extended by law; but exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, shall be exercised by the United States, which shall have exclusive control and jurisdiction over the same; but nothing in this proviso contained shall be construed to prevent the service within said park of civil and criminal process lawfully issued by the authority of said State; and the said State shall not be entitled to select indemnity school land for the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections that may be in said park reservation, as the same is now defined or may be hereafter defined."

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PETER MOOG.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 1104) to relieve Peter Moog from the charge of desertion, with Senate amendment.

The amendment of the Senate was read at length.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. I was unable to ascertain whether or not the House bill, as it passed, carried any appropriation of money, and whether the appropriation is found alone in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The proposition is to relieve from a charge of desertion.

Mr. ROGERS. I did not inquire as to that. I inquired as to whether or not the original House bill carried an appropriation, or whether the appropriation is alone confined to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already answered the question.

Mr. ROGERS. I make the point of order that this bill should be considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will examine into that matter. The Chair would call the attention of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr.

CUTCHEON] to the fact that a point of order is made against the Senate amendment.

Mr. ROGERS. I make the additional point, also, that it ought to go to the proper committee.

The SPEAKER. That would follow as a matter of course if it is to be considered, unless non-concurrence is asked and the conference requested by the Senate is agreed to, which would change it.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I move to non-concur in the Senate amendment and agree to the conference asked.

Mr. CRISP. I make the point of order upon that, that there has not been such non-concurrence between the two Houses as makes the request for a conference a privileged motion. As I understand the rule, before a request for a conference can be privileged there must be disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment. Now, this is a House bill with a Senate amendment. The House has never passed upon the amendment, and until the House non-concurs in the amendment the bill is not in a situation where a motion for a conference is privileged; so the motion that this bill should go to a committee must carry it there, notwithstanding the Senate request for a conference. I know it was the practice under the old rules that there must be disagreeing votes of the two Houses before it was in order to ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. But there have been conflicting decisions upon that point.

Mr. CRISP. But, Mr. Speaker, I think there was a review of the conflicting decisions in the last House by Mr. Speaker CARLISLE, where he expressly held on a review of all the decisions and stated, as the Chair has said, that there had been conflicting decisions that the settled and satisfactory rule under general parliamentary law as practiced was, that a motion for a conference was only privileged when there had been disagreeing votes between the two Houses.

The SPEAKER. That was a decision overruling a previous decision of his own, was it not?

Mr. CRISP. I think so.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Chair will lay the bill aside and pass upon the question at some future time. It is a matter the Chair would like to examine.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate requested the return of the bill (S. 3751) to grant to the Mobile and Dauphin Island Railroad and Harbor Company a right to trestle across the shoal water between Cedar Point and Dauphin Island.

LEASE OF PIER BY VESSEL-OWNERS OF CHICAGO, ILL.

The Speaker laid before the House the joint resolution (H. Res. 104) to permit the Secretary of War to lease pier, as petitioned by vessel-owners of Chicago, Ill., with Senate amendments.

The amendments were read at length.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate and agree to the request for a committee of conference.

Mr. CRISP. I do not object to the motion to non-concur, but I make the point that the bill is not in a condition where it is privileged to put the motion to agree to the request for a conference.

The SPEAKER. On what ground?

Mr. MASON. With the consent of the gentleman from Georgia, if he thinks that is proper, as I am in no hurry about the matter, I will simply move to non-concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. CRISP. The bill is in a condition for non-concurrence, but is not in condition for a motion to agree to the request for a conference.

The SPEAKER. It seems to be in a position to non-concur. Usually the motion is to non-concur and agree to the request for a conference.

Mr. CRISP. I think, as I understand the rule, it is certainly in order to move to non-concur; but this double motion to non-concur and agree to the conference requested is another matter.

The SPEAKER. That has been the custom. The gentleman can have a division if he desires.

Mr. CRISP. No, sir; I do not.

The SPEAKER. It is simply a convenient way of disposing of the business before the House.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman from Illinois explain the matter? Possibly we might want to concur and not take the trouble of non-concurrence in the amendments. Why should we not concur in the amendments of the Senate?

Mr. MASON. I have not heard the whole of the amendments read, but the Senator who reported it told me that the proper way was to non-concur and have a committee of conference appointed, and then an agreement could be reached.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. What is the difference between the proposition as it passed the House and the amendments put on by the Senate?

Mr. MASON. The House passed a resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to make a revocable license to any one whom he saw fit in the best interests of the Government for the temporary use of a certain pier, following the precedents established in certain cases. Now, as I understand the amendments, they fix a specific firm to whom the revocable license is to be granted; and the way I desire to have it passed is that the Secretary of War shall be authorized to do whatever he can for the best interests of the Government, and gives every one a chance at it. That is my object.

Mr. McMILLIN. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois in that; and if the bill should be passed at all he is correct. There is no reason why the exclusive privilege should be given to one firm, but if the privilege is given it should be given to every one.

Mr. MASON. That is what I say.

Mr. McMILLIN. I do not think it is right to do it as the gentleman suggests the Senate amendment proposes.

Mr. MASON. Then I think the best way is to move to non-concur and agree to the conference asked, and I make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The question is on non-concurrence in the Senate amendments and agreeing to the conference asked.

The motion was agreed to. So the House non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate and agreed to the conference requested.

EXPLANATION.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, upon referring to the RECORD of July 2, I find that I am not named as present and voting or as paired on the amendment to the Federal election bill offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH]. I desire to state that I was paired with Mr. FLOOD, of New York, on that vote.

JAMES SHOWALTER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a bill (S. 1741) granting an increase of pension to James Showalter, with the disagreement of the Senate to the House amendment thereto, and a request for a committee of conference.

The House, by unanimous consent, insisted upon its amendment and agreed to the conference requested by the Senate.

JACKSONVILLE, ST. AUGUSTINE AND HALIFAX RIVER RAILWAY CO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a bill (H. R. 9104) granting to the Jacksonville, St. Augustine and Halifax River Railway Company a right of way across the United States military reservation at St. Augustine, Fla., with amendments of the Senate thereto, and a request for a committee of conference.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments to this bill. They are designed simply to better protect the interests of the Government by providing that the flood water in the ditch shall not be obstructed, and that grade crossings shall be provided by the railroad company.

The motion was agreed to; and the amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

ADDITIONAL ASSOCIATE JUSTICE, NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a bill (H. R. 5966) to provide for an additional associate justice of the supreme court of the Territory of New Mexico, with amendments of the Senate thereto.

Mr. BUCHANAN, of New Jersey. The amendments of the Senate are simply verbal, and I move that they be concurred in.

The amendments were concurred in.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from further consideration of the bill (S. 2786) for the donation of the Fort Brooke military reservation at Tampa, Fla., for free schools and other purposes; and it was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

ABANDONED MILITARY RESERVATIONS IN WYOMING.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a bill (H. R. 8245) to provide for the disposal of the abandoned military reservations in Wyoming Territory, with amendments of the Senate thereto.

The amendments were read, as follows:

Page 1, line 4, strike out "and the Fort Fetterman hay reservation."

Page 1, line 14, after the word "entry," insert "not exceeding one quarter-section."

Page 1, line 24, strike out "of land shall contain at least" and insert in lieu thereof "may include adjoining lands to the amount of."

Amend the title so as to read: "An act granting certain lands in the Territory of Wyoming for public purposes."

Mr. CAREY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman please state the effect of the Senate amendments.

Mr. CAREY. The bill provides for the disposal of five or six large military reservations in Wyoming Territory that were established during the times of Indian troubles in that Territory. It proposes to dispose of certain of the lands to actual settlers who were upon them on the 1st day of January last, not exceeding 160 acres of land to each settler. The other lands are to be disposed of to actual settlers under the homestead law. The Senate amendments are of a clerical character with the exception of the one which strikes out Fort Fetterman hay reservation. That is a small reservation which the Senate committee thought had better be disposed of under the law of 1884, which provides for its disposal in 40-acre tracts.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman says that the bill gives a preference to those who were upon these lands last January.

Mr. CAREY. Yes.

Mr. McMILLIN. Why is that? They were there in violation of law, were they not?

Mr. CAREY. Technically, yes; but not so under the practice that has prevailed in the Western country. These reservations contain many thousand of acres, in one instance I believe a hundred thousand acres, and all through the Western country it has been the habit as soon as the reservations were abandoned for settlers to squat upon them, and this bill simply provides that the settlers who went upon those lands and made valuable improvements shall have a right to procure under existing law the lands, not exceeding 160 acres to each occupant.

Mr. DUNNELL. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that this has been the uniform practice. Where military reservations have been abandoned and the lands turned over to the public domain, provision has always been made for those who were on them at the time.

Mr. CAREY. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that these lands are no more valuable than the acres that adjoin the reservation.

Mr. McMILLIN. If the custom has been as the gentleman states, my action upon this question would probably be influenced by a very long continued custom; but as an original proposition it appears to me of questionable propriety to give a "sooner" an advantage over a person who observes the law and goes upon no land except that which he is authorized to occupy.

Mr. CAREY. I have no doubt that the gentleman could go out there to-day and take up on any of these reservations 160 acres of just as good land as that occupied by these settlers.

Mr. ROGERS. I wish to ask the gentleman from Wyoming a question, but before doing so I want to make a single observation.

These House bills, coming back to us with Senate amendments, are handed to the Speaker or the Clerk and are put upon the table. Under the rule they are laid before the House without any gentleman perhaps having knowledge of the particular measure or having opportunity to make examination of it. Nor are we even advised sufficiently, under the rulings of the Chair, as to what class of bills will be laid before the House or which will go to committees. The result is the only information we can gather is from the reading of the Senate amendments; and nothing could be more unintelligible than the reading of an amendment referring to line so and so of such and such a section of a bill which has not been read.

I do not know what the practice is or ought to be under the present ruling; but it does seem to me that where the House is called upon to vote on amendments which are not purely verbal or formal, the bill itself, or so much of it as would make the amendments intelligible to the House, ought to be read.

As applicable to the observations I have just made, I want to ask the gentleman from Wyoming what is meant by the Senate amendment, which, as I recollect, uses the language, "as well as other adjoining lands." What does that refer to? It would seem to imply that in this amendment we are not only disposing of Government reservations, but perhaps other adjoining land.

Mr. CAREY. No such interpretation is admissible.

Mr. ROGERS. I only wanted to know what is meant by that language, and I do not know any other way to get the information than by this inquiry.

Mr. CAREY. The bill is very short and, if the gentleman prefers it, let it be read.

Mr. ROGERS. I would be very glad to have it read, if that is the practice of the House.

The SPEAKER. The practice of the House is to read the Senate amendments. The House bill having been passed by the House, members are presumed to be acquainted with its provisions; but if any gentleman does not recollect the bill and calls for its reading, the bill also can be read.

Mr. ROGERS. I shall be glad to have the House bill read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the House bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all public lands now remaining undisposed of within the abandoned military reservations in the Territory of Wyoming, known as Forts Fetterman (post), Laramie, Sanders, and Steele (post) military reservations, and the Fort Fetterman hay reservation, and that portion of the Fort Bridger reservation heretofore abandoned for military purposes, and which are not otherwise occupied or used for any public purpose, are hereby made subject to disposal under the homestead law only: Provided, That actual occupants thereon upon the 1st day of January, 1890, if otherwise qualified, shall have the preference right to make one entry under either of the existing land laws, which shall include their respective improvements: Provided further, That any of such lands as are occupied for town-site purposes, and any of the lands that may be shown to be valuable for coal or minerals, such lands so occupied for town-site purposes, or valuable for coal or minerals, shall be disposed of as now provided for lands subject to entry and sale under the town-site, coal, or mineral land laws, respectively: Provided further, That this act shall not apply to any subdivision of land, which subdivision of land shall contain at least 160 acres, on which any buildings or improvements of the United States are situated until the Secretary of the Interior shall so direct: Provided further, That the passage of this act shall not be construed to amend or repeal the act approved May 28, 1888, entitled "An act granting certain lands in the Territory of Wyoming for public purposes."

Mr. DUNNELL. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Wyoming when these reservations were abandoned.

Mr. CAREY. The Fort Bridger reservation was abandoned, I think, in 1872.

Mr. DUNNELL. By act of Congress?

Mr. CAREY. By act of Congress. There are some 25,000 or 30,000 acres of that which have not been disposed of. The Fort Sanders and Fort Steele military reservations were abandoned, I should say, five or six years ago. The Fort Laramie reservation has been abandoned during the present year; the Fort Fetterman reservation has been abandoned probably for six to eight years. The Fort Fetterman hay reservation, which is excepted from the provisions of this bill by the Senate because it is a small reservation, has been abandoned probably for some eight or ten years.

Mr. ROGERS. There is one provision here which I would like the gentleman from Wyoming to explain. The bill provides—

That this act shall not apply to any subdivision of land, which subdivision of land shall contain at least 160 acres, etc.

The Senate amendment proposes to strike out the words "of land shall contain at least" and insert "may include adjoining lands to the amount of;" so that it would read:

That this act shall not apply to any subdivision of land, which subdivision may include adjoining lands to the amount of 160 acres, etc.

Now, is that confined to the reservations, or does it go outside?

Mr. CAREY. It is confined to the reservations; and it has reference, I believe, to only one of these reservation, where the Government, in the disposal of these military buildings some eight or ten years ago, reserved the new building which had been erected at Fort Fetterman for the Quartermaster's Department, it being supposed that at some time or other in case of Indian troubles the Government might want to use that building again. Besides, the Government some years ago built an iron bridge across the Platte River at Fort Laramie, which bridge the Government still owns, though there is an arrangement with the county in which it is situated to keep the bridge in repair; and it was supposed the Government might want to reserve the lands covering the approaches to the bridge on either side.

Mr. ROGERS. Do I understand, then, that any part of these reservations disposed of by the bill contain Government buildings upon them?

Mr. CAREY. No, sir; not any part at all. The only thing this proposes to do is to allow the Secretary of the Interior, if he thinks proper, to reserve a 40-acre tract and adjoining lands, making a total of not exceeding 160 acres, on which may be situated any public building.

Mr. ROGERS. But has the Secretary of the Interior under the provisions of this bill the right to permit a man to enter land on which stands a Government building?

Mr. CAREY. No; not at all.

Mr. ROGERS. I thought the gentleman said the Secretary of the Interior would have the discretion—

Mr. CAREY. I say that under the bill he may reserve this 40-acre tract and adjoining lands to the extent of 160 acres; but there are but two instances where this condition will exist, one where there is an old Government building not worth to-day $25, and the other where a bridge was built across the Platte River on the Laramie reservation, where the Government may desire to reserve the lands covering the approaches to the bridge.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not desire to delay the passage of the bill any further.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming to concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

PREVENTION OF COLLISIONS AT SEA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 3917) to adopt regulations for preventing collisions at sea.

The SPEAKER. This is a Senate bill, substantially similar to a House bill reported by a House committee and now on the Calendar. The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the remainder of the first section of the bill be dispensed with, simply stating that the remainder of this section embodies the regulations adopted by the International Marine Conference, which have been published and distributed throughout the country for the past six months. They embrace about twenty pages of the bill, and relate simply to technical matters of detail as to marine signals. The reading of this portion of the bill would afford but little information to the members.

Mr. McCREARY. Let me ask the gentleman if this has been reported by a committee.

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes, sir; reported unanimously.

Mr. McCREARY. I understood the Speaker to say that it was a Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. It is a Senate bill, but identical with the House bill.

Mr. McCREARY. The same as the House bill reported from the committee?

Mr. DINGLEY. Word for word with the bill on the House Calendar.

I ask to dispense with the reading of the formal portion of this section of the bill, which simply designates the signals, for the purpose of facilitating the consideration of the bill.

Mr. McCREARY. This is the same code of signals as that adopted by the International Marine Conference?

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROGERS. The House bill, I understand, has never yet been read in the House. Now it is proposed to dispense with the reading of the Senate bill. I think both ought to be read.

The SPEAKER. The request of the gentleman from Maine is to dispense with the reading of the remainder of the first section, relating to the signals, which, he explains, has already been generally published throughout the country.

Mr. ROGERS. It is then proposed to dispense with the reading of the bill pro tanto. Now, I do not think we ought to pass so important a bill without at least once reading it.

Mr. DINGLEY. But I am sure the reading of this part of the bill would afford no information whatever to the gentleman. Besides this is merely a formal matter agreed upon by the conference as to the signals at sea, occupying, as I have said, twenty pages of the bill and has been distributed throughout the country for the past six months. It has been adopted unanimously by the marine conference as well as by the House committee, and as it is merely formal I thought it might be dispensed with and proceed with the reading from section 2.

Mr. ROGERS. I am glad to see that the gentleman from Maine is so familiar with the bill. I congratulate the country and the House that it is so well advised about this matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

Mr. ROGERS. I object.

Mr. CANNON. Then I ask the gentleman from Maine to withdraw the report for the present. It will evidently take considerable time, and later on he can present it.

Mr. DINGLEY. The State Department are awaiting this authority, with a view to corresponding with foreign Governments on the subject, and have been waiting for two weeks. I hope the House will proceed to consider the matter now. It can not take very long.

Mr. CANNON. The whole country, including Maine, is awaiting legislation touching original packages, I would say to the gentleman, too.

Mr. DINGLEY. Nothing can be more important, it seems to me, than the consideration of measures tending to prevent collisions at sea.

Mr. McMILLIN. I would suggest to the gentleman from Maine that he allow this bill to lie on the table temporarily and take it up hereafter.

Mr. DINGLEY. I suggest, then, Mr. Speaker, that the bill be printed in full in the RECORD and be taken up to-morrow morning for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the bill be now withdrawn and printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed to read the bill.

Mr. CANNON. Is it in order now to make a privileged report?

The SPEAKER. The reading of this bill has been commenced.

Mr. McMILLIN. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is it in order to move the reference of this bill to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries?

Mr. FARQUHAR. That is the committee that it came from.

Mr. DINGLEY. It has been reported already by that committee.

The SPEAKER. It is in order to make the motion, but the bill must first be read.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I only yielded in making this report, which I am instructed to make by the Committee on Rules, because it was stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR] that this would take but a few minutes—

Mr. DINGLEY. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] will withdraw his objection, and let the bill be printed and go over.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I would agree very gladly to accommodate the gentlemen, but I think the saving of human life on the ocean is of decidedly more importance than the passing of bills in the interest of prohibition cranks; and hence I insist on the objection.

Mr. CANNON. Then I will make this report the moment this bill is disposed of.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill. It is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following regulations for preventing collisions at sea shall be followed by all public and private vessels of the United States upon the high seas and in all waters connected therewith, navigable by sea-going vessels.

PRELIMINARY.

In the following rules every steam-vessel which is under sail and not under steam is to be considered a sailing vessel, and every vessel under steam, whether under sail or not, is to be considered a steam-vessel.

The word "steam-vessel" shall include any vessel propelled by machinery. A vessel is "under way" within the meaning of these rules when she is not at anchor, or made fast to the shore, or aground.

RULES CONCERNING LIGHTS, ETC.

The word "visible" in these rules when applied to lights shall mean visible on a dark night with a clear atmosphere.

ARTICLE 1. The rules concerning lights shall be complied with in all weathers from sunset to sunrise, and during such time no other lights which may be mistaken for the prescribed lights shall be exhibited.

ART. 2. A steam-vessel when under way shall carry—(a) On or in front of the foremast, or if a vessel without a foremast, then in the forepart of the vessel, at a height above the hull of not less than 20 feet, and if the breadth of the vessel exceeds 20 feet, then at a height above the hull not less than such breadth, so, however, that the light need not be carried at a greater height above the hull than 40 feet, a bright white light, so constructed as to show an unbroken light over an arc of the horizon of twenty points of the compass, so fixed as to throw the light ten points on each side of the vessel, namely, from right ahead to two points abaft the beam on either side, and of such a character as to be visible at a distance of at least 5 miles.

(b) On the starboard side a green light so constructed as to show an unbroken light over an arc of the horizon of ten points of the compass, so fixed as to throw the light from right ahead to two points abaft the beam on the starboard side, and of such a character as to be visible at a distance of at least 2 miles.

(c) On the port side a red light so constructed as to show an unbroken light over an arc of the horizon of ten points of the compass, so fixed as to throw the light from right ahead to two points abaft the beam on the port side, and of such a character as to be visible at a distance of at least 2 miles.

(d) The said green and red side-lights shall be fitted with inboard screens projecting at least 3 feet forward from the light, so as to prevent these lights from being seen across the bow.

(e) A steam-vessel when under way may carry an additional white light similar in construction to the light mentioned in subdivision (a). These two lights shall be so placed in line with the keel that one shall be at least 15 feet higher than the other, and in such a position with reference to each other that the lower light shall be forward of the upper one. The vertical distance between these lights shall be less than the horizontal distance.

ART. 3. A steam-vessel when towing another vessel shall, in addition to her side-lights, carry two bright white lights in a vertical line one over the other, not less than 6 feet apart, and when towing more than one vessel shall carry an additional bright white light 6 feet above or below such light, if the length of the tow measuring from the stern of the towing vessel to the stern of the last vessel towed exceeds 600 feet. Each of these lights shall be of the same construction and character, and shall be carried in the same position as the white light mentioned in article 2 (a), excepting the additional light, which may be carried at a height of not less than 14 feet above the hull.

Such steam-vessel may carry a small white light abaft the funnel or aftermast for the vessel towed to steer by, but such light shall not be visible forward of the beam.

ART. 4. (a) A vessel which from any accident is not under command shall carry at the same height as the white light mentioned in article 2 (a), where they can best be seen, and if a steam-vessel in lieu of that light, two red lights, in a vertical line one over the other, not less than 6 feet apart, and of such a character as to be visible all around the horizon at a distance of at least 2 miles; and shall by day carry in a vertical line one over the other, not less than 6 feet apart, where they can best be seen, two black balls or shapes, each 2 feet in diameter.

(b) A vessel employed in laying or in picking up a telegraph cable shall carry in the same position as the white light mentioned in article 2 (a), and if a steam-vessel, in lieu of that light, three lights in a vertical line one over the other not less than 6 feet apart. The highest and lowest of these lights shall be red, and the middle light shall be white, and they shall be of such a character as to be visible all around the horizon, at a distance of at least 2 miles. By day she shall carry in a vertical line, one over the other, not less than 6 feet apart, where they can best be seen, three shapes not less than 2 feet in diameter, of which the highest and lowest shall be globular in shape and red in color, and the middle one diamond in shape and white.

(c) The vessels referred to in this article, when not making way through the water, shall not carry the side-lights, but when making way shall carry them.

(d) The lights and shapes required to be shown by this article are to be taken by other vessels as signals that the vessel showing them is not under command and can not therefore get out of the way.

These signals are not signals of vessels in distress and requiring assistance. Such signals are contained in article 31.

ART. 5. A sailing vessel under way and any vessel being towed shall carry the same lights as are prescribed by article 2 for a steam-vessel under way, with the exception of the white lights mentioned therein, which they shall never carry.

ART. 6. Whenever, as in the case of small vessels under way during bad weather, the green and red side lights can not be fixed, these lights shall be kept at hand, lighted and ready for use; and shall, on the approach of or to other vessels, be exhibited on their respective sides in sufficient time to prevent collision, in such manner as to make them most visible, and so that the green light shall not be seen on the port side nor the red light on the starboard side, nor, if practicable, more than two points abaft the beam on their respective sides.

To make the use of these portable lights more certain and easy the lanterns containing them shall each be painted outside with the color of the light they respectively contain, and shall be provided with proper screens.

ART. 7. Steam-vessels of less than 40, and vessels under oars or sails of less than 20 tons gross tonnage, respectively, when under way, shall not be obliged to carry the lights mentioned in article 2 (a) (b) and (c), but if they do not carry them they shall be provided with the following lights:

First. Steam-vessels of less than 40 tons shall carry—
(a) In the forepart of the vessel, or on or in front of the funnel, where it can best be seen, and at a height above the gunwale of not less than 9 feet, a bright white light constructed and fixed as prescribed in article 2 (a), and of such character as to be visible at a distance of at least 2 miles.

(b) Green and red side lights constructed and fixed as prescribed in article 2 (b) and (c), and of such a character as to be visible at a distance of at least 1 mile, or a combined lantern showing a green light and a red light from right ahead to two points abaft the beam on their respective sides. Such lantern shall be carried not less than 3 feet below the white light.

Second. Small steam-boats, such as are carried by sea-going vessels, may carry the white light at a less height than 9 feet above the gunwale, but it shall be carried above the combined lantern mentioned in subdivision 1 (b).

Third. Vessels under oars or sails, of less than 20 tons, shall have ready at hand a lantern with a green glass on one side and a red glass on the other, which, on the approach of or to other vessels, shall be exhibited in sufficient time to prevent collision, so that the green light shall not be seen on the port side nor the red light on the starboard side.

The vessels referred to in this article shall not be obliged to carry the lights prescribed by article 4 (a) and article 11, last paragraph.

ART. 8. Pilot vessels when engaged on their station on pilotage duty shall not show the lights required for other vessels, but shall carry a white light at the masthead, visible all around the horizon, and shall also exhibit a flare-up light or flare-up lights at short intervals, which shall never exceed fifteen minutes.

On the near approach of or to other vessels they shall have their side lights lighted, ready for use, and shall flash or show them at short intervals, to indicate the direction in which they are heading, but the green light shall not be shown on the port side nor the red light on the starboard side.

A pilot vessel of such a class as to be obliged to go alongside of a vessel to put a pilot on board may show the white light instead of carrying it at the masthead, and may, instead of the colored lights above mentioned, have at hand ready for use a lantern with a green glass on the one side and a red glass on the other, to be used as prescribed above.

Pilot vessels when not engaged on their station on pilotage duty shall carry lights similar to those of other vessels of their tonnage.

ART. 9. Fishing vessels and fishing boats when under way and when not required by this article to carry or show the lights therein named shall carry or show the lights prescribed for vessels of their tonnage under way.

(a) Vessels and boats, when fishing with drift-nets, shall exhibit two white lights from any part of the vessel where they can best be seen. Such lights shall be placed so that the vertical distance between them shall be not less than 6 feet and not more than 10 feet, and so that the horizontal distance between them, measured in a line with the keel, shall be not less than 5 feet and not more than 10 feet. The lower of these two lights shall be the more forward, and both of them shall be of such a character as to show all around the horizon, and to be visible at a distance of not less than 3 miles.

(b) Vessels, when engaged in trawling, by which is meant the dragging of an apparatus along the bottom of the sea—

First. If steam-vessels, shall carry in the same position as the white light mentioned in article 2 (a) a tricolored lantern so constructed and fixed as to show a white light from right ahead to two points on each bow, and a green light and a red light over an arc of the horizon from two points on either bow to two points abaft the beam on the starboard and port sides, respectively; and, not less than 6 nor more than 12 feet below the tricolored lantern, a white light in a lantern, so constructed as to show a clear, uniform, and unbroken light all around the horizon.

Second. If sailing, of 7 tons gross tonnage and upwards, shall carry a white light in a lantern, so constructed as to show a clear, uniform, and unbroken light all around the horizon, and shall also be provided with a sufficient supply of red pyrotechnic lights which shall each burn for at least thirty seconds, and shall be shown on the approach of or to other vessels in sufficient time to prevent collision.

In the Mediterranean Sea the vessels referred to in subdivision (b) 2 may use a flare-up light in lieu of a pyrotechnic light.

All lights mentioned in subdivision (b) 1 and 2 shall be visible at a distance of at least 2 miles.

Third. If sailing vessels of less than 7 tons gross tonnage, shall not be obliged to carry the white light mentioned in subdivision (b) 2 of this article, but if they do not carry such light they shall have at hand, ready for use, a lantern showing a bright white light, which shall, on the approach of or to other vessels, be exhibited where it can best be seen in sufficient time to prevent a collision, and they shall also show a red pyrotechnic light, as prescribed in subdivision (b) 2, or in lieu thereof a flare-up light.

(c) Vessels and boats when line-fishing with their lines out and attached to their lines, and when not at anchor or stationary, shall carry the same lights as vessels fishing with drift-nets.

(d) Fishing vessels and fishing boats may at any time use a flare-up light in addition to the lights which they are by this article required to carry and show.

All flare-up lights exhibited by a vessel when trawling or fishing with any kind of drag-net shall be shown at the after part of the vessel, excepting that if the vessel is hanging by the stern to her fishing gear, they shall be exhibited from the bow.

(e) Every fishing vessel and every boat when at anchor shall exhibit a white light visible all around the horizon at a distance of at least 1 mile.

(f) If a vessel or boat when fishing becomes stationary in consequence of her gear getting fast to a rock or other obstruction, she shall show the light and make the fog-signal prescribed for a vessel at anchor, respectively. (See article 15 (d) (e) and last paragraph.)

(g) In fog, mist, falling snow, or heavy rain-storms drift-net vessels attached to their nets, and vessels when trawling, dredging, or fishing with any kind of drag-net, and vessels line-fishing with their lines out shall, if of 20 tons gross tonnage or upwards, respectively, at intervals of not more than one minute make a blast; if steam-vessels with the whistle or siren, and if sailing vessels with the fog-horn, each blast to be followed by ringing the bell.

(h) Sailing vessels or boats fishing with nets or lines or trawls, when under way, shall in daytime indicate their occupation to an approaching vessel by displaying a basket or other efficient signal, where it can best be seen.

The vessels referred to in this article shall not be obliged to carry the lights prescribed by article 4 (a) and article 11, last paragraph.

ART. 10. A vessel which is being overtaken by another shall show from her stern to such last-mentioned vessel a white light or a flare-up light.

The white light required to be shown by this article may be fixed and carried in a lantern, but in such case the lantern shall be so constructed, fitted, and screened that it shall throw an unbroken light over an arc of the horizon of twelve points of the compass, namely, for six points from right aft on each side of the vessel, so as to be visible at a distance of at least 1 mile. Such light shall be carried as nearly as practicable on the same level as the side lights.

ART. 11. A vessel under 150 feet in length, when at anchor, shall carry forward, where it can best be seen, but at a height not exceeding 20 feet above the hull, a white light in a lantern so constructed as to show a clear, uniform, and unbroken light visible all around the horizon at a distance of at least 1 mile.

A vessel of 150 feet or upwards in length, when at anchor, shall carry in the forward part of the vessel, at a height of not less than 20 and not exceeding 40 feet above the hull, one such light, and at or near the stern of the vessel, and at such a height that it shall be not less than 15 feet lower than the forward light, another such light.

The length of a vessel shall be deemed to be the length appearing in her certificate of registry.

A vessel aground in or near a fair-way shall carry the above light or lights and the two red lights prescribed by article 4 (a).

ART. 12. Every vessel may, if necessary in order to attract attention, in addition to the lights which she is by these rules required to carry, show a flare-up light or use any detonating signal that can not be mistaken for a distress signal.

ART. 13. Nothing in these rules shall interfere with the operation of any special rules made by the Government of any nation with respect to additional station and signal-lights for two or more ships of war or for vessels sailing under convoy, or with the exhibition of recognition signals adopted by ship owners, which have been authorized by their respective Governments and duly registered and published.

ART. 14. A steam-vessel proceeding under sail only, but having her funnel up, shall carry in daytime, forward, where it can best be seen, one black ball or shape 2 feet in diameter.

SOUND SIGNALS FOR FOG, ETC.

ART. 15. All signals prescribed by this article for vessels under way shall be given:

1. By "steam-vessels," on the whistle or siren.
2. By "sailing vessels and vessels towed," on the fog-horn.

The words "prolonged blast" used in this article shall mean a blast of from four to six seconds' duration.

A steam-vessel shall be provided with an efficient whistle or siren, sounded by steam or by some substitute for steam, so placed that the sound may not be intercepted by any obstruction, and with an efficient fog-horn, to be sounded by mechanical means, and also with an efficient bell. [In all cases where the rules require a bell to be used a drum may be substituted on board small sea-going vessels.] A sailing vessel of 20 tons gross tonnage or upward shall be provided with a similar fog-horn and bell.

In fog, mist, falling snow, or heavy rain-storms, whether by day or night, the signals described in this article shall be used as follows, namely:

- (a) A steam-vessel having way upon her shall sound, at intervals of not more than two minutes, a prolonged blast.
- (b) A steam-vessel under way, but stopped, and having no way upon her, shall sound, at intervals of not more than two minutes, two prolonged blasts, with an interval of about one second between them.
- (c) A sailing vessel under way shall sound, at intervals of not more than one minute, when on the starboard tack one blast, when on the port tack two blasts in succession, and when with the wind abaft the beam three blasts in succession.
- (d) A vessel when at anchor shall, at intervals of not more than one minute, ring the bell rapidly for about five seconds.
- (e) A vessel at anchor at sea, when not in ordinary anchorage ground, and when in such a position as to be an obstruction to vessels under way, shall sound, if a steam-vessel, at intervals of not more than two minutes, two prolonged blasts with her whistle or siren, followed by ringing her bell; or, if a sailing vessel, at intervals of not more than one minute, two blasts with her fog-horn, followed by ringing her bell.
- (f) A vessel when towing shall, instead of the signals prescribed in subdivisions (a) and (c) of this article, at intervals of not more than two minutes, sound three blasts in succession, namely, one prolonged blast followed by two short blasts. A vessel towed may give this signal and she shall not give any other.
- (g) A steam-vessel wishing to indicate to another "the way is off my vessel, you may feel your way past me," may sound three blasts in succession, namely, short, long, short, with intervals of about one second between them.
- (h) A vessel employed in laying or in picking up a telegraph cable shall, on hearing the fog-signal of an approaching vessel, sound in answer three prolonged blasts in succession.
- (i) A vessel under way, which is unable to get out of the way of an approaching vessel through being not under command, or unable to maneuver as required by these rules, shall, on hearing the fog-signal of an approaching vessel, sound in answer four short blasts in succession.

Sailing vessels and boats of less than 20 tons gross tonnage shall not be obliged to give the above-mentioned signals, but if they do not, they shall make some other efficient sound signal at intervals of not more than one minute.

SPEED OF SHIPS TO BE MODERATE IN FOG, ETC.

ART. 16. Every vessel shall, in a fog, mist, falling snow, or heavy rain-storms, go at a moderate speed, having careful regard to the existing circumstances and conditions.

A steam-vessel hearing, apparently forward of her beam, the fog-signal of a vessel the position of which is not ascertained, shall, so far as the circumstances of the case admit, stop her engines, and then navigate with caution until danger of collision is over.

STEERING AND SAILING RULES.
PRELIMINARY—RISK OF COLLISION.

Risk of collision can, when circumstances permit, be ascertained by carefully watching the compass bearing of an approaching vessel. If the bearing does not appreciably change, such risk should be deemed to exist.

ART. 17. When two sailing vessels are approaching one another, so as to involve risk of collision, one of them shall keep out of the way of the other, as follows, namely:

- (a) A vessel which is running free shall keep out of the way of a vessel which is close-hauled.
- (b) A vessel which is close-hauled on the port tack shall keep out of the way of a vessel which is close-hauled on the starboard tack.
- (c) When both are running free, with the wind on different sides, the vessel which has the wind on the port side shall keep out of the way of the other.
- (d) When both are running free, with the wind on the same side, the vessel which is to windward shall keep out of the way of the vessel which is to leeward.
- (e) A vessel which has the wind aft shall keep out of the way of the other vessel.

ART. 18. When two steam-vessels are meeting end on, or nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision, each shall alter her course to starboard, so that each may pass on the port side of the other.

This article only applies to cases where vessels are meeting end on, or nearly end on, in such a manner as to involve risk of collision, and does not apply to two vessels which must, if both keep on their respective courses, pass clear of each other.

The only cases to which it does apply are, when each of the two vessels is end on, or nearly end on, to the other; in other words, to cases in which, by day, each vessel sees the masts of the other in a line, or nearly in a line, with her own; and by night, to cases in which each vessel is in such a position as to see both the side-lights of the other.

It does not apply by day to cases in which a vessel sees another ahead crossing her own course; or by night, to cases where the red light of one vessel is opposed to the red light of the other, or where the green light of one vessel is opposed to the green light of the other, or where a red light without a green light or a green light without a red light is seen ahead, or where both green and red lights are seen anywhere but ahead.

ART. 19. When two steam-vessels are crossing, so as to involve risk of collision, the vessel which has the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other.

ART. 20. When a steam-vessel and a sailing vessel are proceeding in such directions as to involve risk of collision, the steam-vessel shall keep out of the way of the sailing vessel.

ART. 21. Where, by any of these rules, one of two vessels is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course and speed.

ART. 22. Every vessel which is directed by these rules to keep out of the way of another vessel shall, if the circumstances of the case admit, avoid crossing ahead of the other.

ART. 23. Every steam-vessel which is directed by these rules to keep out of the way of another vessel shall, on approaching her, if necessary, slacken her speed or stop or reverse.

ART. 24. Notwithstanding anything contained in these rules, every vessel overtaking any other shall keep out of the way of the overtaken vessel.

Every vessel coming up with another vessel from any direction more than two points abaft her beam, that is, in such a position with reference to the vessel which she is overtaking that at night she would be unable to see either of that vessel's side lights, shall be deemed to be an overtaking vessel; and no subsequent alteration of the bearing between the two vessels shall make the overtaking vessel a crossing vessel within the meaning of these rules, or relieve her of the duty of keeping clear of the overtaken vessel until she is finally past and clear.

As by day the overtaking vessel can not always know with certainty whether she is forward of or abaft this direction from the other vessel she should, if in doubt, assume that she is an overtaking vessel and keep out of the way.

ART. 25. In narrow channels every steam-vessel shall, when it is safe and practicable, keep to that side of the fair-way or mid-channel which lies on the starboard side of such vessel.

ART. 26. Sailing vessels under way shall keep out of the way of sailing vessels or boats fishing with nets, or lines, or trawls. This rule shall not give to any vessel or boat engaged in fishing the right of obstructing a fair-way used by vessels other than fishing vessels or boats.

ART. 27. In obeying and construing these rules due regard shall be had to all dangers of navigation and collision, and to any special circumstances which may render a departure from the above rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger.

SOUND SIGNALS FOR VESSELS IN SIGHT OF ONE ANOTHER.

ART. 28. The words "short blast" used in this article shall mean a blast of about one second's duration.

When vessels are in sight of one another, a steam-vessel under way, in taking any course authorized or required by these rules, shall indicate that course by the following signals on her whistle or siren, namely:

- One short blast to mean, "I am directing my course to starboard."
- Two short blasts to mean, "I am directing my course to port."
- Three short blasts to mean, "My engines are going at full speed astern."

NO VESSEL, UNDER ANY CIRCUMSTANCES, TO NEGLECT PROPER PRECAUTIONS.

ART. 29. Nothing in these rules shall exonerate any vessel, or the owner, or master, or crew thereof, from the consequences of any neglect to carry lights or signals, or of any neglect to keep a proper look-out, or of the neglect of any precaution which may be required by the ordinary practice of seamen, or by the special circumstances of the case.

RESERVATION OF RULES FOR HARBORS AND INLAND NAVIGATION.

ART. 30. Nothing in these rules shall interfere with the operation of a special rule, duly made by local authority, relative to the navigation of any harbor, river, or inland waters.

DISTRESS SIGNALS.

ART. 31. When a vessel is in distress and requires assistance from other vessels or from the shore, the following shall be the signals to be used or displayed by her, either together or separately, namely:

- In the daytime—
 - First. A gun fired at intervals of about a minute;
 - Second. The International Code signal of distress indicated by N C;
 - Third. The distance signal, consisting of a square flag, having either above or below it a ball or anything resembling a ball;
 - Fourth. Rockets or shells as prescribed below for use at night;
 - Fifth. A continuous sounding with any fog-signal apparatus.
 - At night—
 - One. A gun fired at intervals of about a minute;
 - Two. Flames on the vessel (as from a burning tar-barrel, oil-barrel, etc.);
 - Three. Rockets or shells, bursting in the air with a loud report and throwing stars of any color or description, fired one at a time at short intervals;
 - Four. A continuous sounding with any fog-signal apparatus.
- SEC. 2. That all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the foregoing regulations for preventing collisions at sea, for the navigation of all public and private vessels of the United States upon the high seas, and in all waters connected therewith navigable by sea-going vessels, are hereby repealed, except where local rules shall hereafter be adopted by the board of supervising inspectors of steam-vessels.

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect at a time to be fixed by the President by proclamation issued for that purpose.

MR. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for the adoption, on proclamation by the President, of the regulations to prevent collisions at sea which were unanimously adopted by the recent International Marine Conference. It will be remembered that the International Marine Conference was held on our own invitation. The bill which provided for the conference was introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY], and passed at the first session of the Fiftyth Congress—

MR. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I would like to inquire what has become of the House bill.

MR. DINGLEY. The House bill is on the House Calendar and is identical with this bill, which has passed the Senate.

MR. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I understood that to be so, but some of the gentlemen near me did not understand it.

MR. DINGLEY. The invitation of the United States under the act of July, 1888, introduced originally by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY], was extended to thirty-eight powers, and twenty-eight, including all the maritime powers, accepted the invitation, and the International Marine Conference met in Washington in October, 1889, closing its labors December 31, 1889, after unanimously adopting the code of signals and rules of the road at sea adopted by this bill. The importance of uniform rules of the road at sea and one uniform language as expressed by signals to prevent collisions can hardly be overestimated. There are over 30,000 vessels above 100 tons burden to-day navigating the ocean, of which nearly one-third in number and three-fourths in tonnage are steam-vessels and a large proportion of those vessels are pursuing the same great lanes of travel. In 1820 only 1 per cent. of the tonnage navigating the ocean was steam; in 1840 it was only 11 per cent.; now it is 75 per cent. In consequence of the increase of the number of steam-vessels and the great increase of speed the risk of collision has been greatly increased.

As the result of that, it has been found of the highest importance that there should be adopted one language for vessels navigating the ocean, in order that they may signal each other and avoid collisions, and this code of signals and these rules of the road at sea are the result of the work of this conference, unanimously agreed to by twenty-seven maritime nations. These regulations have been recommended to Congress by the Secretary of State and by the United States members of the International Marine Conference.

It is sufficient to say that these gentlemen, representing the leading maritime powers, have reached the unanimous conclusion that this code of signals will prove the most effective, and will avoid more than any other that can be adopted the danger of collision at sea. Therefore, inasmuch as the United States inaugurated the conference, it is expected by the other powers that the United States will lead off in the adoption of this code of signals. This bill is to go into operation whenever the President by proclamation shall indicate that other powers have adopted it. The Secretary of State has corresponded with Congress and asked that prompt action be taken in this matter, and I suppose there can be but one opinion respecting the importance of it and the necessity for the immediate passage of this bill. Now, Mr. Speaker, unless some one desires some further information, I will move the previous question.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard briefly upon one section of the bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas for this purpose. How much time does he want?

Mr. ROGERS. I desire also to offer an amendment with reference to that section. I wish to explain the point involved in it in a very few words.

Mr. DINGLEY. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. ROGERS. I would like a little more than that.

Mr. DINGLEY. I yield ten minutes.

Mr. ROGERS. I will try and finish what I have to say in that time. I do not suppose that it was the intention of the Senate, or of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] by this bill, which of itself is so meritorious, to change the rule of law with reference to the liability of the Government of the United States for the misconduct or neglect of officers on any of its vessels. From the foundation of the Government down to the present time, so far as I know, no occasion has occurred where the Government of the United States has been mulcted in damages for the neglect or misconduct of an officer of the Government who was in command or control of one of its vessels, and a recognition of a principle of that kind may result in great loss and injury to the Government.

There has always been a remedy preserved to the citizens of the United States, not only in that but in many other classes of cases, for any loss which they may have sustained by reason of such action on the part of the Government of the United States, and that is by an application to Congress for the necessary relief. In the first section of this bill it will be observed that it is provided that the following regulations for preventing collisions at sea shall be followed by all public and private vessels, etc. Then, if my friend will turn to article 29 he will find this provision:

Nothing in these rules shall exonerate any vessel or the owner or master or crew thereof from the consequences of any neglect to carry lights or signals, or of any neglect to keep a proper look out, or of the neglect of any precaution which may be required by the ordinary practice of seamen, or by the special circumstances of the case.

That is the section which I propose to amend, and I send to the Clerk's desk an amendment prepared by my colleague upon the Judiciary Committee [Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas] at my suggestion, while the bill was being read.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the amendment being read for information. I understand the gentleman from Arkansas does not offer the amendment, but simply wishes it read as a part of his remarks.

Mr. ROGERS. I send it up to be offered, if I may be permitted to offer it.

Mr. DINGLEY. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that these rules have been adopted intact by the International Marine Conference after the experience that all nations have had in reference to the matter, and that in the article to which he refers there is no change from the present rule. The Government can not be sued, and application must be made to Congress in the future, as it has been in the past, by the owners of any private vessel in collision with a Government vessel who claims that they have been damaged by the neglect of the master of the Government vessel. I do not understand that this bill can make any difference.

Mr. ROGERS. I understand it does make a difference. That is the precise point.

Mr. DINGLEY. Of course any modification of the rules by Congress would destroy their uniformity, and tend to defeat the very end which has been sought—that of securing uniform rules of the road for the ocean. There is no reason why a public vessel should not be subject to the same rules of the road at sea as the private vessel. Otherwise there would be no relief against collisions secured by the bill. The rules of the road at sea as now existing apply to public vessels as well as to private vessels. In this respect there is no change in this bill from the law as it exists now, and such an amendment as is proposed would tend to defeat the very rules which have been adopted by all these delegates, and which are now before the several Governments represented in the conference.

Mr. ROGERS. I should like to have the amendment read. The gentleman, I fear, has consumed the whole of my ten minutes.

Mr. DINGLEY. I will yield the gentleman further time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the Government of the United States shall not be held responsible in damages for injuries or loss occasioned by the neglect or misconduct of any officer, or for the failure of any officer commanding United States vessels to comply with the regulations of this act.

Mr. DINGLEY. I did not yield for an amendment to be offered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman did not yield for an amendment.

Mr. ROGERS. I suppose I will find an opportunity to get it in, but I wanted to continue my remarks in response to the gentleman from Maine for a moment.

He says that it does not change the rule of law. I might respond that if it does not change the rule of law the necessity for it does not exist so far as vessels of the United States are concerned; but I do not understand that it does change the rule of law. We have had a bill I know in the present Congress emanating from the great State of Maine, which has been here I think for consideration by Congress for something less than thirty years.

The Congress of the United States so far has never made any appropriation for the payment of that claim, nor so far has it made any provision to allow the claimant to go into the courts and have it adjudicated; but it is still here, and we can not tell, in view of the many bills that are almost without precedent during the present session, how soon that bill may be referred to the Court of Claims for adjudication, and when it shall go there to be litigated under these circumstances, we find in this section 29 of the present bill a provision which holds that the Government of the United States is to be subject to the same provisions as to its public vessels as are the owners of private vessels, and of course embracing this particular case, modified by the rule of law laid down in section 29 of this bill, which is that nothing in these rules shall exonerate the Government. At present, under the law, the Government is not liable, and is not to be sued, and if sued can not be held responsible in law. This bill provides that nothing in these rules shall exonerate any vessel or the owner or master or crew thereof, and it exonerates the Government of the United States be the owner, then nothing herein shall exonerate it from liability that may occur even if it be by the carelessness or negligence or drunkenness, if you please, of its officers.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. MILLIKEN. If the United States employs a drunken shipmaster and by his carelessness he runs your vessel down, why should not the Government of the United States be held responsible for the act of its agent just as a private individual or corporation is for the act of its agent?

Mr. ROGERS. We open up a wide field, Mr. Speaker, in the courts of the United States in the particular case mentioned by taking it from the general rule, when it has not had consideration for some twenty or thirty years, and both political parties have for long periods had possession of the House. If that principle is hereafter to be the rule of law, it had occurred to me (and I had only an opportunity of ascertaining the provision was expressed in this bill during the reading of it) that it ought to be done only after full deliberation and full debate, so that if hereafter the Government is to be held liable it shall be after there shall have been a full determination upon that subject by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Let me say to my friend it occurs to me that it is mighty hard upon an individual owner that he has had to be applying to Congress for thirty years without getting a decision in his case.

Mr. ROGERS. The Government, as I have said, is not liable in damages for the neglect or misconduct of one of its officers or servants.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is, no suit can be brought against the Government.

Mr. ROGERS. And if it were brought it would not be done under existing law. That is best illustrated by the fact that heretofore, prior to the present Congress, this very bill that I use as an illustration of the principle involved was prepared simply for reference to the Court of Claims; but when it was prepared and introduced during the present session of Congress there was incorporated in it a provision which required that when it goes to the Court of Claims it be relieved from the rule of law which extends everywhere on that subject by providing in substance—I do not quote the language, as I have not the bill before me—that the same rule of law should apply in that as in the cases of individuals.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman pardon me there?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is there anything in this bill which authorizes a private individual to sue the Government for the recovery of damages where a vessel owned by the United States has done damage to a vessel of an individual?

Mr. ROGERS. Not at all. I do not say that there is.

Mr. DINGLEY. Or does it change existing law as to the remedy of owners of private vessels in collision with Government vessels?

Mr. ROGERS. If you should pass the bill I have just referred to, simply to refer it to the Court of Claims, then by the terms of section 29 of this bill, when that bill comes back to be heard here, instead of applying the rule of existing law as applied by sovereign nations you relieve it by this act.

Mr. DINGLEY. Should not the Government have the same rules of the road at sea applied to it as to individuals?

Mr. ROGERS. But while the Government of the United States should undoubtedly be called upon to observe the rules of the road which private individuals and all the other nations on the earth are required to observe, yet I deny that it is a correct principle to apply to the Government of the United States this rule of law which, if the Government shall be allowed to be sued hereafter, will subject it to the same rule of responsibility that applies to individuals. We ought not to apply that rule to a sovereign government. In these cases that are deemed meritorious, if there are such, I am willing to concede that Congress ought to make the necessary provision for citizens who have sustained loss by the improper action of Government officers, but by this bill you put the power, provided you once refer their case to the court, in the hands of the opposite party and you put it out of the power of Congress to pass upon the question of the liability of the Government.

Mr. DINGLEY. That depends upon the power given to the court by the bill of reference, does it not?

Mr. ROGERS. You put the Government in this attitude, that in order to avoid the payment of a judgment rendered against it, it must repudiate the action of its own court. Now, I think the question should be left where the wisdom of past generations has left it, unchanged with reference to the rule of law which shall apply in this particular class of cases. I did not hear the last observation of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. DINGLEY. My suggestion was this, whether, under this bill, as under existing law, the extent of the authority of the Court of Claims when any claim is referred to that court would not depend upon the act which authorized the reference. If it provided for a judgment, then the court could give judgment; but if it provided only for a report on the facts, which is the usual case, what possible change would there be? The facts would simply be ascertained and reported as directed.

Mr. ROGERS. But my friend from Maine forgets that in the very case that I have sought for an illustration, seeing that if they went to the Court of Claims without this rule of law they would be met by the general principle that the Government is not responsible for the malfeasance, the non-feasance, or the negligence of its officers, they sought by that bill to incorporate a change of law. Now this bill which you have here would not only make the rule apply to that case when it gets to the Court of Claims, but also to all other cases where loss has been sustained by an individual by reason of a collision with a vessel of the Government.

I repeat, when you have once sent a case of this kind to any court and it has been determined and a judgment has been rendered against the United States, then we are in a position where we must either repudiate the judgment of the court or else pay the claim, without any action on the part of Congress even looking into the case. No one could appreciate more fully than my friend from Maine how the changes would be rung if anyone should undertake to rise in his place here and criticise the action of the court rendering a judgment. Even as to the Court of Claims, which has been so often discounted in debate here and so often ridiculed and its judgments refused to be paid by Congress in many instances, a court organized exclusively of Republicans, but, I doubt not, men of ability, gentlemen are found here who think that the judgments of that court—and I include myself among the number who hold that opinion—are infinitely better than the ordinary judgments of any committee of the House of Representatives based upon an investigation made in the usual way.

And, Mr. Speaker, if such a case should be sent to a higher court, or a court of greater dignity (assuming that there are such), and a final judgment should be rendered—not a finding of facts merely, but a final judgment against the Government—who would be found prepared to stand up here and insist that we should revise the judgment of that court? Upon the contrary, I myself have uniformly held, not only with reference to other courts, but even with reference to the Court of Claims, that when they have once passed upon a subject their judgment ought to be accepted at least as prima facie evidence, and that unless something in the nature of fraud or deceit can be shown Congress ought not under any circumstances to undertake to look back of the judgment of the court.

Mr. DINGLEY. There is no change made by this bill from existing law in the particulars to which the gentleman has referred. Under the present law of the road at sea national vessels are subject to the same rules as private vessels. There is also a provision in the existing law with reference to the prevention of collisions at sea, almost identical in character with that which is contained in this bill. Yet that gives to the owner of a private vessel which has come into collision with a national vessel no right to institute a suit in court for the recovery of damages. He can only come to Congress, and Congress may either examine the facts and determine for themselves whether anything shall be paid, or they may refer the case to the Court of Claims for report of the facts or for adjudication and judgment, in which case, of course, the judgment would be binding upon Congress.

There certainly is no reason why a vessel of the United States should be in different relations to another vessel that it comes into collision with as to the rule of the road at sea from that which would govern in the case of private vessels, and it seems to me that the objection which the gentleman has stated is one which is equally strong against the present rule of the road at sea. Gentlemen may rest assured that the representatives of Great Britain and of every commercial nation, having naval vessels tenfold or even a hundred-fold greater in number than ours, have not assented to a rule of the road at sea that is not just to national vessels as well as to private vessels.

Mr. ADAMS. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. He is discussing two subjects; first, the rules of the road at sea, and, second, the liability for a violation of those rules. Now, I am aware that the greater part of this bill is the result of the deliberations of the marine conference.

Mr. DINGLEY. It is entirely so.

Mr. ADAMS. Including section 29?

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes, sir. Every provision in this bill relating to the rules of the road at sea was adopted by the International Marine Conference.

Mr. ADAMS. Including the provision in regard to the liability of the owner?

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes, including article 29, which the gentleman from Arkansas criticises.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. I wish to ask the gentleman from Maine this question: Why is it that Congress has uniformly refused to adjust and pay claims for damages occasioned in the way the gentleman speaks of?

Mr. DINGLEY. Congress has not uniformly refused to do so. It has paid in a large number of cases of collision.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. Has it not been from the fact that the Congress of the United States has uniformly refused to acknowledge that the Government should be held responsible for the torts of its own officers, and is it not a fact that that rule is embedded in the very soundest principles of good policy?

Mr. DINGLEY. Does the gentleman from Texas mean to say that under the present rules of the road at sea, where the master of a United States vessel disregards those rules, the Government has not always been held liable to pay damages, although not liable to be sued in court?

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. I do not understand that the Government has been held liable.

Mr. DINGLEY. Perhaps I should have said the Government has regarded itself liable.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. I know this: That Congress has refused to pay for losses resulting from the torts and negligence of Government officers at sea.

Mr. DINGLEY. But the gentleman must bear in mind—

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. But if this bill be passed you bind Congress by the principle you announce in it.

Mr. DINGLEY. I suggest that the gentleman should bear in mind that the neglect or omission here spoken of on the part of an officer of a United States vessel refers to the omission or neglect to give the signals required by the rules of the road at sea, and that if the master of a vessel of the United States is negligent in giving the signals required of all vessels and a collision should thereby occur, it has always been held that the United States ought to pay the damages in such cases. That is all the neglect that is referred to here.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman says, "It has always been held." Held by whom? Congress has never recognized that principle, has it?

Mr. DINGLEY. I think Congress has always recognized the principle to this extent: That if the master of a United States vessel has been found at fault in neglecting to give the signals required by law, and a collision has occurred in consequence of this neglect, Congress has felt bound to pay damages on the part of the Government in such cases.

Mr. CRISP. May I ask my friend from Maine what difference in principle there is between the case of a violation, as the gentleman expresses it, of the law of the road at sea and any other wrongful act by an officer of the United States, happening on shore or anywhere else, by which injury is inflicted? What difference in principle is there? Is it not the policy of all governments not to hold themselves liable in damages for the wrongful acts of their officers or agents?

Mr. DINGLEY. I think, on the contrary, it has been the policy of all maritime nations to hold their own national vessels to the same rules of the road at sea that are observed by vessels belonging to private owners, because here is a common highway for the vessels of all nations—for vessels belonging to private persons as well as those belonging to Governments; and all maritime nations have recognized the necessity of requiring the masters of all vessels, whether public or private, pursuing this common road at sea, to observe the same rules in order to avoid collisions, because, if there should be any release of national vessels from the obligation to observe the established rules in such cases, the gentleman will see at once that it would tend to neglect on the part of Government officers and that there might result collisions in which there would be great loss of life. It is not in accordance with a sound public policy not to apply the same rules of the road to national vessels as to private vessels.

Mr. CRISP. That is the point I had in mind, and I want to get the gentleman's opinion about it, because this is a matter with which I do not profess to be familiar. The gentleman, perhaps, would say that the Government ought to be responsible for the wrongful acts of its agents, just as an individual is, yet no Government does hold itself responsible in that way.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is, not responsible in the sense of allowing itself to be sued in the courts; but, as a matter of fact, all the maritime nations have held themselves responsible for damages resulting from collisions in cases where their own officers neglected to observe the rules of the road at sea.

Mr. CRISP. What I wanted to get at was the difference in principle. The gentleman says that as to maritime matters, Governments have held themselves responsible in this way; but he admits that such is not the case as to other matters. For instance, if the gentleman's agent does a wrongful act within the scope of his authority, the gentleman would be liable; but at the same time the gentleman admits that the Government has never held itself liable for the wrongful acts of its officers.

Mr. DINGLEY. But in case of collisions at sea, where it could be shown that the master of a national vessel had violated the rules of the road, and a collision had occurred in consequence, Congress has always stepped in and paid the damages.

Mr. CRISP. That may be so; but what I wish to know is, what is the difference in principle. I do not understand why there should be a different rule as to maritime matters from that which is recognized in other matters.

Mr. DINGLEY. The difference seems to arise from the necessities of the case. Vessels which are pursuing their voyages upon the ocean, whether those vessels be private or national, for the protection of property and life must be governed by a common code of the sea, otherwise collisions will occur and there will be great loss of property and life. The necessity is so great that maritime nations have always recognized that in regard to the observance of the rules of the road their public vessels should be held to the same strict accountability as private vessels, and if the gentleman will reflect a moment I think he will see there is great propriety in applying the same rule in both cases.

Mr. CRISP. I can see that there might be propriety, in a certain sense, in holding the Government responsible for any wrongful act of its officers. You might say that in any such case the Government is morally bound to assume the same position in regard to its liability for damages resulting from the act of its agents that would be applied where damages resulted from the wrongful act of the agent of an individual. Yet, as a great question of public policy, no Government on earth does hold itself responsible for the torts or wrongful acts of its officers; and I think this is put upon the ground that it is not practicable for Governments thus to hold themselves responsible; that the general interest of the public demands that in such cases the individual injured should suffer, rather than that the whole people should be liable to taxation to make compensation for the wrongful act of some individual officer.

Mr. DINGLEY. But I think the gentleman from Georgia will observe that neither under the existing law nor under the present law is there now given any right to sue the United States in the courts for such damages; and therefore it comes back in all cases to the judgment of Congress as to what is just and equitable in the view of the law laid down upon the subject.

Mr. CRISP. But the injured party would have the same right to come and appeal to the equity and justice of Congress without the bill as if the bill were passed. Unless, therefore, the bill gives something more than that, which they can do just as well without the bill as with it, I do not see the object of it. Because any man can introduce a bill for the relief of a party who has a claim arising under such circumstances, but this bill expressly says that the Government shall be liable, or that "nothing in it shall exonerate the Government" from its share of liability because of such damages.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Let me ask the gentleman a question. What harm will the bill do if it does pass? If the bill does not do any harm, it is better that it should go as it is and become the law, having been agreed upon by the conference.

Mr. CRISP. The harm, I understand, is in saying that the Government is liable, when the present law says that the Government is not liable.

Mr. MILLIKEN. But I believe that where the Government has confided its property to the shipmaster upon the high seas he becomes, in part, so to speak, the owner, and I believe that the Government should be holden if his wrongdoing as the agent of the Government causes a collision and loss or injury. Because, if it is not intended that the Government shall obey the marine signals just as private shipmasters are governed by them, then when the private ship is approaching a public vessel, how does it know what to do?

If the Government does not acquiesce in these regulations and adopt the common language for the use of vessels at sea, then of course it is difficult for the private ship-owner to know what is best to be done when meeting a Government vessel, and risk and danger are the result.

Mr. CRISP. But it is presumable that an officer of the Government obeys the orders he has received from headquarters, and that he is acting on the high seas in obedience to his orders. The same rule of the road would operate; and the mere question of damages would not affect the individual officer, because of the fact that he would not have to pay it. He is governed only by the orders which he has received from his superiors; and the only influence to operate on him to require him to do that which is right and obey the law of the road at sea is the order he gets from the superior officer, because the question of liability would not affect him at all.

Mr. ROGERS. I would like to have the gentleman from Maine read the provision of the existing law which he says is in substance the same as this.

Mr. DINGLEY. I have not the provision before me; but I refer to the act of 1882 or 1883.

Mr. ROGERS. I will send for it.

Mr. DINGLEY. If there is nothing more to be said, I wish simply to add in conclusion that the International Marine Conference, composed of maritime experts from all nations, have considered all of the questions which naturally grow out of this subject and all of the representatives of this conference have agreed to the common rule and unspoken language of the sea which has been embodied in this bill for the guidance of vessels. Hence I do not feel, for one, that it is either proper or that anything but evil can result from an attempt to change the agreement they have made. I am sure, in view of the experience of all the gentlemen who have united in the formulation of these rules, that they will be considered the best judges of the subject and the most proper and competent persons to present a code of rules to prevent collisions and consequent loss of life and property at sea.

I now demand the previous question.

Mr. ROGERS. I want to be heard very briefly further.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PAYSON). The question is on the demand of the gentleman from Maine for the previous question.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore decided that by the sound the "noes" had it.

Mr. DINGLEY. I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 68.

Before the negative vote was counted,

Mr. DINGLEY said: We may as well have the yeas and nays.

Mr. CANNON. Then the gentleman had just as well make a call of the House, for there is evidently no quorum present. I make the point of order that there is no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That can only be ascertained by either a count of the House or a call of the roll; and the question now is on ordering the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CANNON. I understand that it is competent to move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not until the lack of a quorum has been developed in some proper method, in the judgment of the Chair. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Maine for the previous question.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 100, nays 90, not voting 138; as follows:

Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee, with Mr. MANSUR, from July 7 until July 10.

Mr. MCKINLEY with Mr. MILLS, until August 1.

Mr. DE HAVEN with Mr. BIGGS, on all questions except silver bill, bankruptcy, and national-bank legislation.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I desire to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS].

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to know if a quorum voted.

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then I desire to withdraw my vote, as I am paired with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ALLEN]. If he were present, I would vote "nay."

The SPEAKER. On this question the yeas are 100 and the nays 90, and the previous question is ordered. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, if in order, I desire to move to recommit this bill to the committee reporting it, the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, with instructions to report it back with the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not yet in order. The question is upon ordering the bill to a third reading.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. ROGERS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to make the motion which I have already indicated. I move that the bill be recommitted to the committee reporting it, with instructions to report it back with the amendment I send to the Clerk's desk to be added to article 29 of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding to article 29 the following words:

"Provided, That the Government of the United States shall not be held responsible in damages for injuries or loss occasioned by the neglect or misconduct of any officer, or for the failure of any officer commanding United States vessels to comply with the regulations of this act."

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. ROGERS, and the Speaker announced that the yeas seemed to have it.

Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. ROGERS demanded a division.

The House divided, and there were—yeas 41, yeas 87.

Mr. DINGLEY. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 67, nays 112, not voting 149; as follows:

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan, with Mr. RICHARDSON.

For this day:

Mr. THOMPSON with Mr. PAYNTER.

On motion of Mr. DINGLEY, by unanimous consent, the recapitulation of the vote was dispensed with.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am paired with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MONTGOMERY]. I sat in my seat and heard my name called, but fearful that there was some qualification to the pair, I declined to vote. I find that the only qualification is upon political questions. I therefore ask if I am privileged to vote?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BURROWS in the chair). The Chair thinks not.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

So the bill was passed.

The following additional pairs were announced:

For the rest of the day:

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan, with Mr. RICHARDSON.

Mr. ATKINSON, of Pennsylvania, with Mr. HEMPHILL.

Mr. BOWDEN with Mr. MOORE, of Texas.

Mr. HARMER with Mr. DAVIDSON.

Mr. MOREY with Mr. OWENS, of Ohio.

Mr. FLOOD with Mr. GRIMES, on this vote.

Mr. SANFORD with Mr. O'FERRALL, until Tuesday.

Mr. MORRILL with Mr. DOCKERY, until further notice.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I have voted inadvertently once or twice to-day. I am paired with the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL] and desire to withdraw my vote.

Mr. MOREY. I am paired with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OWENS]. I voted through inadvertence, and desire to withdraw my vote.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the recapitulation of the vote.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important vote, and I think it ought to be recapitulated.

The vote was recapitulated.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

ADMISSION OF WYOMING.

Mr. KENNEDY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled the bill (H. R. 982) to provide for the admission of the State of Wyoming into the Union, and for other purposes; when the Speaker signed the same.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to make a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. PAYSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PAYSON. I desire to inquire whether the motion made by my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], is of superior privilege to the unfinished business pending in the House yesterday evening?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is of such a privilege that when the gentleman has been recognized he can not be taken from the floor.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, having had under consideration the accompanying resolutions, report the following as a substitute and recommend that the same be passed:

Resolved, That immediately after the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order for the Committee on the Judiciary to call up for consideration the bill H. R. 3398, with amendments as reported from said committee, and afterwards the bankruptcy bill (H. R. 3316); this order to continue from day to day for four days successively, or so much of four days as may be necessary for their consideration, beginning with to-day, the same not to interfere with revenue and general appropriation bills and conference reports, and next Saturday shall be set apart for the consideration of private bills under the rules.

Mr. PAYSON. I raise the question of consideration on that resolution.

Mr. MCCREARY. I would like to ask what is the title of the bill S. 398.

Mr. CANNON. The first one is known as the original-package bill. Mr. MCCREARY. This resolution only refers to the original-package and bankruptcy bills?

Mr. CANNON. That is all. Now, Mr. Speaker, I only desire to say that this report is made—

Mr. PAYSON. I raise the question of consideration.

Mr. CANNON. On the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on Rules, and if adopted—

Mr. PAYSON. I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's rights shall be preserved.

Mr. CANNON. The House will at once, under the order, begin the consideration of what is known as the original-package bill.

Mr. ROGERS. I desire to reserve all points of order, and I rise to a point of order.

The point of order I make is that no resolution setting apart any time for the consideration of these measures, or any time for the consideration of measures from the Judiciary Committee, was sent to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CANNON. That would be a very good point of order if it was based upon fact, but the two resolutions for which this one is reported as a substitute accompany it, and, unfortunately for the gentleman's point of order, the resolutions have been passed by the House.

Mr. ROGERS. If I am mistaken about that, it is easy to establish the fact.

Mr. BUCHANAN, of New Jersey. I introduced one of the resolutions myself.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. What about the other?

Mr. CANNON. They are both there, and this is reported as a substitute for the two.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. We would like to hear them both read.

Mr. ROGERS. Before this matter is debated, Mr. Speaker, I insist upon the reading of the original resolution and the substitute.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I think that possibly I have the floor.

Mr. ROGERS. I think the gentleman is not entitled to the floor.

We are entitled to have the original resolution and the substitute read in advance of debate, and I make that point.

Mr. CANNON. Debate had commenced, and I think I have the floor.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I still raise the point of order that the gentleman from Illinois is not entitled to the floor until the question is put from the Speaker's chair in some form or other. Moreover, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] has raised the question of consideration, and that is not debatable; nor is this question debatable pending the determination of the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] raise the question of consideration?

Mr. PAYSON. I raise the question of consideration and I ask whether that is debatable.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is not debatable.

Mr. PAYSON. I raise the question of consideration in the interest of the pending bill, which was unfinished business at the adjournment last evening.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. PAYSON. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement of one minute with reference to this proposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] asks unanimous consent to make a statement. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. I have no objection, and if I have the floor I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order again, if necessary, that this matter is not debatable until the original resolution and the substitute have been read from the Clerk's desk and the question put before the House.

Mr. CANNON. I think debate had already commenced, Mr. Speaker. The SPEAKER. That is not the difficulty. The difficulty is that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] has raised the question of consideration.

Mr. CANNON. I am perfectly content that that question shall be disposed of.

The SPEAKER. That question must be disposed of first. The question is, Will the House now consider the proposition?

Mr. PAYSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it in order for me to ask unanimous consent to occupy two minutes at this time?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to occupy two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. I have no objection if I can have the same consent. The SPEAKER. That is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. CANNON. Then I ask that consent be given for two minutes for my colleague [Mr. PAYSON] and also two minutes for myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ROGERS. Not if it is subject to the point of order.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. ROGERS. I make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. ROGERS. I object if I am to be cut off with the point of order.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. ROGERS. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the question of consideration.

The question was taken on the question of consideration; and the Speaker declared that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. CANNON. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 64, noes 75.

Mr. CANNON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 80, nays 97, not voting 151; as follows:

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. LIND with Mr. PIERCE, for the rest of the day.

Mr. CHEADLE with Mr. LEE, for the rest of the day.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan, with Mr. RICHARDSON, for the rest of the day.

Mr. BYNUM (after a pause). I ask that the result be announced.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to ask unanimous consent that the recapitulation of the vote be omitted?

Mr. BYNUM. I ask that the result of the vote be announced.

The SPEAKER. It can not be announced until the recapitulation be made or dispensed with.

Mr. BYNUM. Then I ask that the vote be recapitulated.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's request will be complied with, and the vote recapitulated.

Mr. OUTHWAITE (after the recapitulation had begun). I ask unanimous consent that the further recapitulation of the vote be dispensed with.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

Mr. WIKE. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. SPRINGER] is detained from the House on account of sickness.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will announce the names of members present and not voting.

The Clerk read the following list:

Mr. CHEADLE, Mr. COBB, Mr. COOPER of Ohio, Mr. DAVIDSON, Mr. HEARD, Mr. LEHLBACH, Mr. LIND, Mr. MCKINLEY, Mr. PAYNTER, and Mr. SPOONER.

Mr. HEARD. I am paired with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. THOMPSON].

The SPEAKER. On this question the yeas are 85 and the nays 72; and a quorum being present to transact business, the yeas have it. So the House decides to consider the conference report.

Mr. MCCREARY. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I ask that the statement of the conferees be read.

Mr. McCREARY. I insist on the motion that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion a moment. The statement should be read in justice to the conferees.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that, the House having determined to consider the report, the statement should be read.

Mr. McCREARY. Is not the motion to adjourn in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain the motion if the gentleman desires to make it.

The Clerk will read the statement.

The statement of the House conferees was read, as follows:

Statement to accompany the conference report upon H. R. 3538.

The conferees upon the part of the House, appointed as such on H. R. 3538, for the relief of Albert H. Emery, having met the conferees upon the part of the Senate for the second time, and at such conference having agreed again to report to the two Houses for allowance to the claimant the same sum as at the first conference, to wit, $75,000, in full of all claims and demands by the claimant against the United States, on account of the testing-machine referred to in the bill, deem it just to the House and to themselves that the reasons for their action should be stated.

1. The conference committee was appointed as the result of an understanding had, prior to the appointment, between a number of gentlemen occupying seats on the floor of the House, some of whom were opposed to the bill, and others who favored it. The amount agreed upon between them as being satisfactory to both sides was the sum of $75,000. As evidence of this statement, we submit the following extracts from the RECORD:

[From proceedings of the House of June 2, 1890.]

ALBERT H. EMERY.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, some time ago the House passed a bill for the relief of Albert H. Emery, appropriating $50,000. The bill went to the Senate and was returned to the House with an amendment appropriating $125,000 and with a request on the part of the Senate for a conference. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] moved that the House disagree to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the conference, which motion was adopted; but subsequently, on the same day, a motion was made to reconsider that action. I now, as a privileged question, call up the motion to reconsider and move to lay that motion on the table, with the view of getting a conference on the bill.

The motion of Mr. BURROWS was agreed to.

[From proceedings of the House of June 4, 1890.]

ALBERT H. EMERY.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will announce as conferees on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 3538) for the relief of Albert H. Emery, Mr. BOOTHMAN, Mr. FARQUHAR, and Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is it in order at this time to move to instruct the conferees on the part of the House just named as to the amount they shall insist upon and propose that as an amendment to the Senate amendment?

I hope the Chair will indulge me in a remark in making this inquiry, for the reason that some days ago it was understood, while the motion was still pending to lay on the table the motion which I had made to reconsider the vote by which a conference was ordered, that the conferees on the part of the House would be instructed by the House to insist on $75,000 instead of $125,000 named in the Senate amendment as the amount that should be finally appropriated by the bill, that an agreement to that effect had been reached, and for that reason I desire to submit this instruction.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would not be in order for two reasons. In the first place, the announcement of conferees is a mere ministerial act; and if the instruction were to be given it should have been given at the time the conferees were ordered. Again, in the second place, it is not customary to instruct the conferees until after a disagreement; that there should be one full, free conference. That has been decided in the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. As to the first matter named by the Speaker, at the moment that the conferees were ordered and when the motion to reconsider was laid on the table, the understanding was that an agreement had been reached by those gentlemen in favor of and those opposed to this bill that the sum of $75,000 should be named instead of $125,000 mentioned in the Senate amendment, and for that reason the motion to lay on the table my motion to reconsider was agreed to nem. con. I desire to make this statement to show why no resistance was made to the motion to lay on the table my motion to reconsider.

Mr. MANSUR. Mr. Speaker, I hope you will indulge me in this statement: That the Committee on Claims have been notified by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] that their side, who have opposed this bill heretofore, will accept the bill with the amount given as $75,000 and end the matter. I would also call the Speaker's attention to the fact that in the Fiftyth Congress, after the Senate disagreed to the five-State bill passed here, and it came back to this House with a request for a conference, the gentleman from New York, Mr. Cox, at the time of the appointment of the conferees, moved that they be instructed, and they were instructed, to abandon New Mexico and insist upon the other four.

The SPEAKER. That was after one conference.

Mr. MANSUR. No, sir; that was not after a conference.

Mr. HOLMAN. The reason why this motion was not made at the time the conferees were ordered was because it was understood that an agreement was reached which would be entirely satisfactory to gentlemen on both sides of this controversy.

Mr. FARQUHAR (to Mr. HOLMAN). There will be no trouble about that.

Mr. MANSUR. I was authorized to make that motion by our committee when it came up.

The SPEAKER. The matter is entirely under the control of the House upon the report of the conferees, and the Chair makes the decision with the less reluctance because no change in the status really occurs.

2. Being governed to a considerable degree in the first conference by the statements referred to, your committee urged upon the Senate conferees as a reason for agreeing to the sum of $75,000 the understanding said to have been arrived at by members of the House in favor of and opposed to the bill.

3. Mainly, if not entirely, that understanding furnished the ground upon which the conferees reached an agreement. Much to the surprise of your committee, when the report was placed before the House, it met with spirited opposition, and was voted down by a vote of 84 in favor to 95 against, not voting 148.

4. This action of the House, to say the least, placed the conferees on the part of the House in an unenviable position. The conferees on the part of the Senate, from our statements to them, had the right to believe that the House would acquiesce in the report. Our statements to them were made in entirely good faith, and relying upon the record quoted. Your committee have felt, and still feel, that that understanding should be carried out, and that they should be relieved from any imputation of bad faith which might arise.

Therefore, in consideration of the facts that the former report was rejected by so light a vote and that the understanding referred to was had, and further because we are thoroughly convinced that we can not get the Senate conferees to accept any less amount, we have felt it to be our duty to again test the will of the House regarding the payment of the sum of $75,000 in this case.

We feel that, if the House shall vote upon a clear understanding of the whole case, it will not leave its conferees in the equivocal position they have been forced to occupy by reason of its former vote; nor, by rejecting this report, consummate an injustice which can not but be manifest to those who have carefully considered the facts involved.

M. M. BOOTHMAN,
JOHN M. FARQUHAR,
WM. C. P. BRECKINRIDGE,

Conferees on the part of the House of Representatives.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Speaker, I now insist on my motion that the House adjourn.

Mr. HITT. May I ask the gentleman if he will yield to me for a moment and allow me to submit a privileged report? It will take but a moment.

Mr. McCREARY. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] has just asked me to yield to him for a personal explanation and I have agreed to do it.

Mr. BYNUM. I insist upon the motion to adjourn.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I hope the gentleman will not do that.

Mr. BYNUM. Very well; I will withdraw it.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a brief personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, in my speech on the Federal election bill, delivered in the House on the 28th of June, I used the following language:

Mr. Speaker, I have said nothing of the application of this bill to New York. That city, sir, has more than a vivid recollection of the way in which the Federal election law was enforced in 1872. Our foreign-born citizens will never forget it. It was true, as the gentleman from Massachusetts has observed, that a few fraudulent naturalization papers were issued in 1868. It was upon this pretense that every foreign-born citizen who appeared at the polls with a Democratic ticket in his hand, exhibiting naturalization papers issued in 1868, was arrested and imprisoned. His papers were taken from him, and in hundreds of instances never returned to him. In vain he pleaded at the office of the United States supervisor for their return.

I say that there are to-day hundreds of foreign-born citizens in the State of New York entitled to vote who can not exercise the franchise because they were robbed of their papers at that time. The plain maxim of justice and law, that a man is presumed to be innocent until proven guilty, was reversed. The rule that ninety-nine guilty men should escape rather than that one innocent man should suffer, was reversed. Every Democrat naturalized in 1868 was presumed to be guilty. Ninety-nine innocent men were punished that one guilty man might not escape. The innocent lost their naturalization papers and the punishment was lasting. No foreign-born citizen in New York State will advocate the passage of this law. They know too well what it means when executed by John I. Davenport. His crafty hand, I am told, was employed in the drafting of this measure. He is a man of brains and an unrelenting partisan. No man better understands the purposes of this bill and no man is better calculated to carry them out.

I now desire to say that I have received the following letter from Hon. John I. Davenport:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 8, 1890.

MY DEAR CUMMINGS: I notice in the RECORD of June 29 your speech on the national election law. I am confident you did not mean to cast any reflection upon my honor as a man, and therefore I take no objection to your criticisms. My official acts are all publicly performed and are just matters of criticism. I do, however, ask your attention to another matter. You have known me for nearly a quarter of a century. You know my friends and associates, both personal and political. You and I differ politically, but personally, so far as I have ever known, have been friendly. I need the "ripe wants of a friend" for a moment, and I ask your consideration to what follows.

This morning I first learned that Mr. CRISP, of Georgia, had, under leave to print, inserted on page 7395 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of date July 2, 1890, a most libelous article from the Commercial Advertiser, of New York City—a journalistic cross-breed of Mugwump and Democrat—of Wednesday, June 18, 1890, concerning myself. The article in question was first seen by me by accident, on the night of its publication, while nearing Baltimore on my way to this city. I returned to New York on Thursday night and on Friday wrote the editor of the Commercial Advertiser a letter inclosing the article and requiring "forthwith a public retraction" thereof.

Leaving my communication to be served upon the editor, I left for Boston upon professional business, arriving there on Friday night. On Saturday morning I received a telegram from my clerk saying that he was unable to obtain service until that morning. On Sunday night I returned to New York and on Monday night returned to this city. On the day I so returned here the Commercial Advertiser printed at the head of its editorial page the following:

"In a recent editorial published in the Commercial, allusion was made to the impropriety of calling on Mr. John I. Davenport to aid in the deliberations of the House committee on Federal elections. We are still of the opinion that the House committee did most unwisely in identifying itself with a gentleman whose actions in the office of supervisor of elections were subject to severe and by no means unfounded criticism, but we are willing to admit, on the testimony of Mr. Davenport's political associates, that we went too far in any reference to his personal character. We are assured that Mr. Davenport is personally an honest man, and, however much we may object to his official performances in the past, it is but just to correct any wrong impression which we may have given upon this point."

I have been detained in this city with the exception of a single day since the date of this publication, June 23. Mr. CRISP certainly did not know of the retraction, but whether he did or did not the infamous attack of the Commercial remains upon the records of Congress. May I ask of you that you obtain leave to make a statement and read this letter, so that it may also appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD?

I am nearing forty-eight years of age and have been chief supervisor of elections in the southern district of New York for twenty years. You know something as to the truth or falsity of the article in question, and as to whether I was ever charged anywhere by any one with either personal, political, or official dishonesty. I do not, however, ask you to say anything for me or on my behalf. I simply ask that you aid me in the matter of my request.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN I. DAVENPORT.

Hon. AMOS CUMMINGS, M. C.

Mr. Speaker, it is proper for me to say that, while reflecting upon Mr. Davenport's official acts, I have no desire to reflect upon his personal character. Twenty years ago I was associated editorially with him upon the New York Tribune. I have known him from that day to this, and I can truthfully say that outside of his official acts I have never known anything against his character as a man. I am confident that if Mr. Davenport had sent a similar letter to my friend from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] he would with great pleasure have asked that the retraction of the Commercial Advertiser be printed in the RECORD, as I am very sure that he has no disposition to do injustice to any one.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Is there a denial anywhere in that letter that Mr. Davenport did assist the Committee on Elections to frame the bill? [Laughter.]

Mr. CUMMINGS. I am speaking of Mr. Davenport as a man, and not as a politician.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the gentleman from New York, I wish to say that the article referred to, quoted from the Commercial Advertiser of New York, was one which I had cut from that paper and had in my desk; and in the course of my remarks I referred to Mr. Davenport's association with the House committee in the preparation of the election bill, and referred to that article in connection with it. I had only five minutes, and had not time to read the article. My friend from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN], however, just as I concluded and was about to take my seat, asked me what was the matter with Mr. John I. Davenport that it was wrong to associate with him? I replied that I knew nothing whatever about him, but that I had an article from the New York Commercial Advertiser stating what was the matter with him, which I would print in connection with my remarks in the RECORD. I did print the article, as the House will remember.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, I hope it is unnecessary for me to say to any man who knows me that had I been aware of the fact that the paper in question had made a retraction or modification of the article I should have said so in the House or had it come to my knowledge that the paper had published a retraction of the article I would not have used it. I had no personal feeling in the matter, for I do not know the gentleman at all.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MCCREARY. I now renew the motion that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion to adjourn the Chair desires to lay before the House a report of the Committee on Enrolled Bills, and some personal requests of members.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. KENNEDY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 5966) to provide for an additional associate justice of the supreme court of the Territory of New Mexico.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Pending the motion to adjourn, by unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted, as follows:

To Mr. CLEMENTS, for ten days.

To Mr. SANFORD, for Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, on account of important business.

To Mr. ROWLAND, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. BUNN, for one week, on account of sickness.

To Mr. MONTGOMERY, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. O'FERRALL, for five days.

To Mr. MILLS, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. DE HAVEN, for the remainder of the session, on account of business.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that a gentleman should not ask for leave of absence for the rest of the session without some explanation. He may ask for indefinite leave of absence very well; but to go away with the express intention of never coming back, it seems to me it is scarcely the proper thing to do.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the request for leave of absence?

Mr. TRACEY. I do not object.

The motion of Mr. MCCREARY was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, the following resolution was introduced and referred as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, that order is closed, and the Chief Clerk will announce the first order of business on the Calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. BLAIR. I desire that there may be a brief executive session this morning, and perhaps this would be as convenient a time as any to move it. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RIO GRANDE JUNCTION RAILWAY.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call up the conference report on the silver question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. 5381) directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. COCKRELL. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. I ask the Senator from Ohio to allow the conference report to be laid aside informally until I can have a right-of-way bill passed. It is a bill granting to the Rio Grande Junction Railway Company the right to cross a piece of land belonging to the Government of the United States. It has the approval of the Interior Department, and the railroad company is practically there and wants to build across the land now. It is very important. The bill is Senate bill 3938, Order of Business 1757.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 3938) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to convey to the Rio Grande Junction Railway Company certain lands in the State of Colorado, in lieu of certain other lands in said State conveyed by the said company to the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill is to be taken up by unanimous consent, subject to objection?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The conference report is privileged, and can be called up at any time.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments, which were, in line 4, after the word "convey," to strike out "by patent;" in line 12, after the word "one," to insert "south of range one," and in the same line, after the word "east," to insert "of the Ute meridian;" in line 23, after the word "convey," to insert "or cause to be conveyed;" in line 24, after the word "fee," to strike out "by deed" and insert "which conveyance shall be satisfactory to the Attorney-General of the United States;" in line 27, after the word "be," to strike out "secured by" and insert "conveyed to;" in line 42, after the word "shall," to strike out "securely" and insert "build and maintain a;" in line 44, after "United States," to strike out "shall maintain" and insert "reserves;" and in line 46, before the word "said," to strike out "in" and insert "over;" so as to make the bill read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized to convey in fee to the Rio Grande Junction Railway Company, for right of way and other necessary railroad purposes, a strip of land in Mesa County, State of Colorado, now held by the United States for school purposes in connection with Grand Junction Indian school, said land being described as follows: Beginning at a point on the Ute meridian 1,709.7 feet north of the southwest corner of section 18, township 1 south, of range 1 east, of the Ute meridian; thence running northward along the said Ute meridian to the northwest corner of the southwest quarter of said section 18; thence easterly along the north line of the said southwest quarter of section 18 to the northeast corner of the said southwest quarter of section 18; thence in a southerly direction along the east line of the said southwest quarter of section 18, 40 feet; thence in a straight line and in a southwesterly direction to the place of beginning, not to exceed in the aggregate 26.3 acres: Provided, That the said railway company shall first convey or cause to be conveyed to the United States in fee, which conveyance shall be satisfactory to the Attorney-General of the United States, the following-described land, in lieu of the land to be conveyed to the said company as herein provided: Commencing at the southeast corner of the southwest quarter of section 18, township 1 south, of range 1 east, of the Ute meridian; thence running east along the south line of said section 18, 70 rods; thence north 80 rods, more or less, to the north line of the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter of said section 18; thence west 70 rods to the east line of the southwest quarter of said section 18; thence south 80 rods, more or less, to the place of beginning; being the west 35 acres of the south half of the southeast quarter of section 18, township 1 south, of range 1 east, of the Ute meridian, together with water rights appurtenant thereto, including 22 statute inches of water from the Mesa County ditch, for the irrigation of said land; Further, That the said railway company shall build and maintain a fence the line of railway next to the school lands: And provided also, That the United States reserves the unrestricted right of way for irrigation purposes over said land to be conveyed to said company as herein provided.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM SMITH.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. HARRIS. I appeal to the Senator from Ohio to allow me to ask the Senate to consider Order of Business 1374, Senate bill 3130, to correct the military record of a citizen of Tennessee. If it takes two minutes' debate, I will withdraw the request.

Mr. SHERMAN. If I thought that would be "the be-all and the end-all" of this I should be very willing to yield, but I see several Senators rising all around and I hope the conference report may be proceeded with.

Mr. HARRIS. This bill has passed the Senate once or twice before and it is important to get it to the other House as soon as possible.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; I will do so.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3130) to correct the military record of William Smith, of Tennessee; which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion from the record of William Smith, of Tennessee, late a private in Battery E, First Tennessee Light Artillery, and grant to the said William Smith an honorable discharge.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUNDAY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Ohio to yield to me that I may make a report from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection. I yield to morning business.

Mr. ALLISON. I report back from the Committee on Appropriations, with sundry amendments, the bill (H. R. 10884) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. ALLISON. I also submit in connection with the bill a report, which I ask may be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is so ordered.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to give notice that at an early day, possibly to-morrow, I shall ask the Senate to consider this bill.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 8245) to provide for the disposal of the abandoned military reservation in Wyoming Territory; and

A bill (H. R. 9104) granting to the Jacksonville, St. Augustine and Halifax River Railway Company a right of way across the United States military reservation at St. Augustine, Fla.

TREASURY NOTES AND SILVER BULLION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes the consideration of the conference report on the bill (H. R. 5381) directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, in continuation of the objections I was making yesterday to this conference report, I desire to call attention now to the last sentence of section 2:

That upon demand of the holder of any of the Treasury notes herein provided for the Secretary of the Treasury shall, under such regulations as he may prescribe, redeem such notes in gold or silver coin, at his discretion, it being the established policy of the United States to maintain the two metals on a parity with each other upon the present legal ratio, or such ratio as may be provided by law.

I made my criticisms of the redemption in gold, and, as I stated yesterday, I would prefer that the language had been "redeemable in coin," but had the language been "redeemable in coin," the same discretionary power could have been exercised by the Secretary of the Treasury that can be exercised under the language used, the only difference being this, that the language here used in this section indicates a preference for and a recognition of the single gold standard, and the Secretaries of the Treasury will so interpret it. They will say we already have by law the single gold standard, and this is simply a declaration that we are trying to bring silver to a parity with gold, and until that parity is established, gold must be given the preference. Every Secretary of the Treasury for years, and especially the distinguished Senator in charge of this conference report [Mr. SHERMAN], first proclaimed to the world that the United States was under obligations of the very highest character to pay all its obligations, all its bonded indebtedness and interest, in gold coin alone.

It has been contended that it is dishonest, that it is even repudiation, to pay them in the standard silver dollar; and the language here is simply a recognition of that principle, of that policy which has been pursued heretofore. Therefore I say that the Secretary of the Treasury will almost absolutely, in the exercise of his discretion, redeem these notes, which are legal-tenders, in gold, and the power which he has is the most dangerous which has ever been vested by any law of Congress in any Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri a question, with his permission.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Does the Senator from Missouri think there is any distinction between this provision and the provision that these notes shall be paid in coin?

Mr. COCKRELL. I have just stated that the Secretary of the Treasury under the language "redeemable in coin" can have the same discretion that he has under this language, but I say that this language is a continuation of the declared policy of a single gold standard, and therefore the Secretary will feel under obligation to recognize it.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator one other question. Does not the Senator recognize the fact that the Secretary can pay in silver if he sees fit?

Mr. COCKRELL. Unquestionably.

Mr. TELLER. Then it is simply a question of how he will exercise the discretion.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no question about that.

Mr. TELLER. Does not the Senator suppose that any Secretary will pay in the coin that the holder demands or requests, if he can?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Is not that proper?

Mr. COCKRELL. I think not.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will allow me just to say one word more.

Mr. COCKRELL. With pleasure.

Mr. TELLER. How has France maintained a parity between the two metals? By giving to the holder of her paper, whenever he went with it to the treasury, gold or silver as he desired. When he went with gold he got silver if he desired it, and if he went with silver he got gold if he desired it; and that is what our Secretary should do as long as he is able and as long as he has the gold. If the holder prefers gold give him gold, and if he prefers silver give him silver.

Mr. COCKRELL. France is and has been in a very different situation. I know the rule in France perfectly well, and it is not applicable here at all.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Will the Senator from Missouri give way to allow me to read a paragraph from the New York Evening Post that is well known to be opposed to silver in all forms and opposed to all movements heretofore made by this Senate in favor of silver, to show the construction that paper puts upon this proposition of the conference committee, because I think it may be of some interest to the distinguished Senator who spoke just now. The article begins:

The report of the conference committee on the silver bill contains some features that were not embraced in either the House or the Senate bill, and that tend to make it a better measure than either of them. These may be enumerated as follows:

1. It is declared to be the "established policy of the United States to maintain the two metals on a parity with each other upon the present legal ratio, or such ratio as may be established by law." This amounts to a direction to the Secretary of the Treasury to keep the two kinds of dollars at par with each other; in other words, to maintain the gold standard. Since the resumption act of 1875 requires the Secretary to redeem United States notes in coin continuously on and after January 1, 1875, and gives him unlimited power to sell bonds for that purpose, this additional direction suffices to maintain the gold standard as long as the credit of the United States suffices for the purpose. If the silver men intended to force the silver standard upon the country, their purpose is foiled by this provision.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is precisely what I have said, and that is from a very able representative of the anti-silver interests of this country, and it is a warning to the distinguished Senator from Nevada that he has abandoned the true and best cause of the people for the equalization of silver with gold. I say that this is intended by the gold monetallists as a bold declaration that this country is still upon the single gold standard and that in the redemption of these notes gold must be used, and as I read yesterday, under the resumption act bonds can be sold if necessary for the purpose of securing the gold to redeem these notes in connection with all other greenbacks and legal-tenders, because there is no difference between them.

I say this is the most dangerous power that any Secretary ever had. If he desires and is willing to do it, he can drive this country to part with every dollar of its gold; he can lock up in the vaults of the Treasury every silver dollar and all the bullion that is offered and keep it locked up there. I say it is the most dangerous power that has ever been since the foundation of this Government intrusted to any Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. PLATT. May I ask the Senator from Missouri a question?

Mr. COCKRELL. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. PLATT. Does the Senator mean to say that he would not give the Secretary of the Treasury a discretion as to which coin he should pay out?

Mr. COCKRELL. Why, certainly; I would say "redeemable in coin." I have said that time and again.

Mr. PLATT. That is all there is to this.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is all very true, but there is with it a declaration which is a fatal thing, and that is, that still the gold standard exists and must be maintained.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I should like to ask the Senator a question, if he will yield.

Mr. COCKRELL. With pleasure.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I should like to know whether he is advocating a change in the terms of the law or in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury. I understand he does not like the Secretary of the Treasury. Is his contention that we shall have a change in the officer at the head of that Department?

Mr. COCKRELL. Not at all.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I did not know but that that was the contention.

Mr. COCKRELL. My contention is not that. My contention is against the language of this conference report and the dangerous power which it vests in any Secretary of the Treasury, no matter who he is. It is the language of this conference report to which I am objecting, and I say again that no such dangerous power has ever been delegated to any Secretary of the Treasury since the organization of the Government of the United States of America.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. There never has been one that did not have it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, Mr. President, I want to take up section 3 of this bill, and to this I enter my most earnest and solemn protest.

Sec. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall each month coin 2,000,000 ounces of the silver bullion purchased under the provisions of this act into standard silver dollars until—

Until—

until the 1st day of July, 1891—

Less than one year from this date—

and after that time—

After July 1, 1891—

he shall coin of the silver bullion purchased under the provisions of this act as much as may be necessary to provide for the redemption of the Treasury notes herein provided for.

Practically, a stoppage of the coinage of the standard silver dollar.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. That is all they want.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is an absolute stoppage of the coinage of the standard silver dollar, and the distinguished Senator from Nevada says that is all they want. In other words, the distinguished Senator from Nevada is willing to abandon the double standard and make silver a mere commodity, stop its coinage, and tell the people of this country that he has done something for them in the restoration of the double standard, while he makes silver a commodity and places it on an equality with your tobacco, and your hemp, and your wheat, and your oats, and your bacon, and your lard, and then join the Farmers' Alliance of the United States in establishing warehouses all over this great country for the storage of your silver commodity in connection with your other material commodities.

If you have a right to degrade silver to a level with tobacco and cotton and corn and wheat and oats, and provide a warehouse for it uncoined, as a mere commodity, you have the same right to do it with regard to other things, and you are treading upon dangerous ground. No such idea would ever have been promulgated throughout the length and breadth of this country by the numerous organizations existing if it had not been for the treatment which silver has received at the hands of the legislative and executive branches of this Government. You are holding out inducements for just such measures. You are encouraging them. You are willing now by this bill, after the 1st of July, 1891, to abandon practically the coinage of a single standard silver dollar, and thenceforth you proclaim to the world that you are willing to let silver be a mere commodity, mere merchandise, to be hoarded up, to be corded away, to be stored away in a Government warehouse called a subtreasury, or a national bank designated as a depository of the Government.

I say this is a total abandonment of all pretention to a double standard. The bill as passed by the Senate established the double standard, not upon the principle of a parity as set forth in this bill between gold and silver, but upon the principle of equality, and that is the only principle upon which you can maintain the double standard. To talk about the maintenance of a double standard upon a mere parity, and absolute regularity in the value, is all a humbug. It can not be done, but you may maintain them upon the equality of the two metals and the equality of like privileges and powers.

You say to the silver to-day, bound hand and foot, bucked and gagged, and upon its back as a mere commodity, "Stand up like a man beside your gold dollar that has been endowed by law with free coinage, absolute legal tender, and an equality between coin and bullion." You might just as well say to a twin brother of two great athletes, who has been bucked and gagged, and bound hand and foot, and prostrate on his back, "Stand up by the side of your twin brother here, and show yourself a man," as to say to silver, bucked and gagged, and cast down as it is, "Stand up on an equality or parity with gold." No metal on the face of God's green earth could lie bound and gagged as it is by legal prescriptions and be on an equality with any other. It is an impossibility. This compromise here is an abandonment, an absolute abandonment, of the double standard.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. COCKRELL. With a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator seems to desire to impress the fact on the Senate and the country that nothing short of free and unlimited coinage will suit him, and I agree that nothing else will suit me. Now, I want to know if the Senator from Missouri did not on the 27th day of January last introduce a bill proposing a different solution of this whole question from that of free and unlimited coinage.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly I did. Unquestionably I introduced a bill providing for an entirely different system.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like the Senator to incorporate that bill as a part of his remarks.

Mr. COCKRELL. That bill looked to free coinage and it looked to placing gold and silver on an equality. My bill provided for a substitution for the gold and silver certificates of a coin certificate—there was the recognition of the perfect equality of gold and silver—and for the purchase of silver bullion to a certain amount per month, $5,000,000 worth, until it got up to 99 cents on the dollar and then for free and unrestricted coinage.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator's bill provided for the purchase by the Secretary of the Treasury of $5,000,000 worth of silver bullion monthly, whereas the bill reported by the conference committee provides for 4,500,000 ounces.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is very true. How much is the difference?

Mr. MITCHELL. It is something more than the amount fixed by the Senator from Missouri. At the rate that silver was quoted yesterday in New York, which was a little short of $1.05, I believe, it would amount to considerably over $5,000,000, and if it goes up to $1.29, as it is hoped it will do if this bill is adopted, it will amount to nearly $70,000,000 per year.

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill which passed the Senate established perfect equality between gold and silver. That is the bill which is now in comparison with the conference report. The question is now whether we shall abandon the bill, passed by an overwhelming majority of the Senate, and agree to the conference report, or whether we shall adhere to the bill passed by the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the Senator will allow me—

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. The question I submit to the Senator from Missouri, in all candor, with those of us who favor the free and unlimited coinage of silver, is this: If we can not get that, shall we refuse to take something else that will be considerably better than the existing law?

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Oregon indicates by his question that this is all we can get. We have made no trial. There has been but one conference committee appointed in this case, and that conference committee has been very prompt in bringing in this report. I believe as firmly as I stand upon the floor of the Senate, that if the Senate will adhere to its bill, the House in the end will agree to it. I have no doubt of it. The House has had no fair chance to pass upon this bill, none at all, and I believe if the Senate will adhere by rejecting this conference report, in the end we shall secure the bill as it passed the Senate.

I say that we have made no fair trial, we have made no determined effort, we have shown no backbone, we have shown no disposition to stand by what we have solemnly done after the fullest and fairest and freest discussion which has ever been had upon any bill before the Senate. We discussed it fully for days and for weeks. We passed a certain bill by an overwhelming majority. It goes to the other House and through a farcical performance is sent back to us and then into conference, and the very first conference committee we appoint comes in with a compromise, or with a sacrifice of the whole principle contained in the Senate bill, with an abandonment of the double standard, the equality of gold and silver, and the practical re-establishment of the single gold standard as proclaimed in the article read by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] from a gold monometallist paper, a representative paper, and as will be claimed by every gold monometallist in this country, for as soon as this conference report is agreed to it will be proclaimed throughout the United States as a grand and glorious triumph for gold monometallism, a reacknowledgment and rebaptism by the action of Congress of the single gold standard as the monetary system of the United States.

The Senator from Arkansas only read, I believe, a part of the article.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. One paragraph.

Mr. COCKRELL. He only read one paragraph of this article from the Evening Post, of New York, of Tuesday, July 8, 1890. I will read the whole article:

The report of the conference committee on the silver bill contains some features that were not embraced in either the House or the Senate bill, and that tend to make it a better measure than either of them. These may be enumerated as follows:

1. It is declared to be the "established policy of the United States to maintain the two metals on a parity with each other upon the present legal ratio or such ratio as may be established by law." This amounts—

Now mark it—

This amounts to a direction to the Secretary of the Treasury to keep the two kinds of dollars at par with each other; in other words, to maintain the gold standard. Since the resumption act of 1875 requires the Secretary to redeem United States notes in coin continuously on and after January 1, 1879, and gives him unlimited power to sell bonds for that purpose, this additional direction suffices to maintain the gold standard as long as the credit of the United States suffices for the purpose. If the silver men intended to force the silver standard upon the country, their purpose is foiled by this provision.

And yet yesterday, when I made the same point, the distinguished Senator from Nevada seemed horrified at it. This is the claim of all the gold monometallists of the country, and it will be the claim of the Secretary of the Treasury. There is not a bit of doubt about it. I proceed with the article:

2. The Secretary is not absolutely required to coin more than $2,000,000 per month of silver, and this requirement is to cease on the 1st of July, 1891. Thereafter he will coin only so much as may be needed to redeem silver Treasury notes presented for the purpose. Another provision repeals the present $2,000,000 per month law from the date of the passage of this act, while this act does not go into effect until the expiration of thirty days. Thus at least one month of the two-millions law is cut off, leaving eleven months of absolute coinage at that rate.

And there for thirty days he is to stop the coining of the two million standard dollars according to the law. See how quick the gold monometallists are to hold out before the country the very thing that the distinguished Senator from Nevada has given to the monometallism of this country by this compromise and surrender. I will go a little further:

3. The bill does not require the purchase of 4,500,000 ounces of silver absolutely, being limited by the words "or so much thereof as may be offered in each month at the market price thereof."

How quick they are to take it up. And yet the Senator from Nevada yesterday in the argument tried to evade the legitimate conclusion and effect of these words "or so much thereof as may be offered in each month at the market price thereof." This shows how they interpret it already. This shows how many gold monometallists in the country and the Secretary of the Treasury with them will interpret this law. I will read this over again for the edification of the Senator from Nevada:

The bill does not require the purchase of 4,500,000 ounces of silver absolutely, being limited by the words "or so much thereof as may be offered in each month at the market price thereof." The determination of the market price is necessarily left to the Secretary.

Well, they say so, and the Secretary of the Treasury will concur with them. That is precisely what I said yesterday would be the interpretation of this law, and here it is, and before the discussion is over they boldly take the position which I said yesterday would be taken by all the gold monometallists.

The determination of the market price is necessarily—left to the Secretary, and if he exercises his discretion impartially, there will be no reason why silver bullion should be offered to him rather than to any other purchaser.

Oh, no; just let him exercise his discretion impartially and no silver bullion will be offered to him. Let him exercise his discretion impartially and there is no danger of any silver bullion being offered him. He is not compelled to take it.

There is the defect in this bill. It abandons even the purchase of the $2,000,000 a month as we have it under the present law, and leaves the amount absolutely in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury without any compulsion at all; it is infinitely inferior to the present law which compels the purchase of $2,000,000 a month. This does not compel the purchase of an ounce of silver.

Mr. McPHERSON. I think the Senator is mistaken in that.

Mr. COCKRELL. Ah! Did my distinguished friend hear the gold monometallist organ speaking for the gold monometallists of the United States, the New York Evening Post? I will read again the third point the writer makes:

3. The bill does not require the purchase of 4,500,000 ounces of silver absolutely, being limited by the words "or so much thereof as may be offered in each month at the market price thereof." The determination of the market price is necessarily left to the Secretary. If he exercises his discretion impartially there will be no reason why silver bullion should be offered to him rather than to any other purchaser.

They know the wires; they know the ropes; they know how they can prevent under this bill a solitary ounce of silver being offered to the Secretary of the Treasury. I say it can be done. I say it boldly that a Secretary of the Treasury inimical to the silver standard and to the coinage of the silver dollar can prevent an ounce of silver being offered under this bill. But I will go further. Now—

4. The silver Treasury notes are a new and distinct form of currency, differing from silver certificates in some particulars. They are to be legal tender, while silver certificates are not. The national banks are not required to receive them on deposit, but if they do receive them, they may count them as part of their lawful reserves. Looking at all the features of the bill, including the one which directs the Secretary to maintain the gold standard—

Now listen—

Looking at all the features of the bill, including the one which directs the Secretary to maintain the gold standard, there is no reason perceived why the banks should not receive the notes on deposit, like any other current funds.

Yet the monometallist bankers are so well satisfied that while they do not receive silver certificates on deposit, they are authorized to receive these notes; they can absolutely treat them as they treat a greenback—a wonderful elevation of these silver certificates, so called, in the estimation of the gold monometallist bankers of the United States! I read further:

5. The Treasury will buy silver bullion at the market price, and pay for the same in Treasury notes, making the same profit that it now makes on silver certificates. If the amount of silver offered is no more than sufficient to meet the requirements of the public for circulation, there will be no drain on the Treasury.

Now, how much is that? About an ounce a month in the estimation of the gold monometallists.

If the offerings should exceed the public demand for circulation the drain on the Treasury would be measured by the excess, and the Secretary might be compelled to sell bonds to replenish his gold balance.

Precisely what I said, and which the distinguished Senator from Colorado seemed to laugh at yesterday that such a thing was possible. Yet, here to-day the gold monometallists of the country are predicting the very condition which I said yesterday would occur, and which would authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell bonds to replenish his gold reserve.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. COCKRELL. With a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. McPHERSON. I wish to ask a question simply for information, as I am somewhat in sympathy with the Senator in his opposition to the conference report, but not for the same reasons, however. Will the Senator answer me this question: What possible objection has he to the maintaining of the gold standard? His argument seems to be, and he appears to play on it with a thousand strings, that he fears there is some evident determination or intention to maintain the gold standard. Now, what possible objection has the Senator to maintaining that standard if it can be done with the increased use of silver as it is proposed it shall be used in the conference bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, to a single gold standard as the only full legal-tender money of this country I am unalterably opposed. But as to a gold and silver standard, placing gold and silver upon a perfect equality before the law as coin and bullion, I am all the time in favor of it. I want to maintain the gold standard equally with the silver standard, and the silver standard equally with the gold standard. My objection to this bill is that it continues the present discrimination in favor of the single gold standard and against silver.

Mr. McPHERSON. If the bullion value of silver is so much less than the bullion value of gold, and they enter into and make up the two coins of the country, how can you maintain it except upon an absolute equality of value? The Senator says it can be done by giving to the silver dollar equality of rights and privileges. Now, there is no equality of rights or privilege that you can give the silver dollar that can possibly make it equal to a gold dollar in value. The history of the world shows that when the cheaper coin becomes the coin of circulation and use, the dearer and the better coin is driven out of circulation. Now, if I understand correctly the purpose of this conference report, it is this: You increase by more than two and one-half, or you more than double the amount of silver you now use in the currency.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think so at all.

Mr. McPHERSON. You use it in a different form; you put it into the Treasury, and upon the bullion so deposited you issue your certificates. To-day we have six different kinds of money. We have gold coin and silver coin and their certificates. We have the greenbacks and the national-bank notes. The silver certificates are redeemable in kind. The gold certificates are redeemable in kind. The greenbacks are redeemable in gold, and the national-bank notes are redeemable in the gold equivalent. Therefore, we have six different kinds of money, all of equal value, but of different forms. It is now proposed, as I understand, in this conference report to make another kind of money. You propose to issue a Treasury certificate, and redeem that certificate, if it should be offered for redemption, in the legal money of the country.

What is the legal money? It is gold, or silver, or greenbacks, all maintained on a parity or equality with gold. When the certificates are issued, in my opinion, they will be maintained in circulation in harmonious companionship with all the other money of the country; they will not be offered for redemption any more than the greenbacks to-day are offered for redemption at the Treasury. Then we have seven different kinds of money, all differing in form, but not differing in value. Each one of these moneys is in circulation in the country, or will be when the Treasury notes are issued on deposit of the bullion, and will be circulating harmoniously one with the other, and all redeemable in what? In money which is maintained just as good as gold.

Now, I ask the Senator from Missouri what objection he has to the money of this country, however much it may differ in form, if it be one in value and maintained as money of the highest standard and the highest excellence? Is it any advantage to the people of this country—

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McPHERSON. In one moment. Is it any advantage to the financial interests of this country to have one class of money worth 30 per cent. less than another? No, sir. Is it any advantage to the people of this country to step down from the highest and best standard of money that the world has ever known to a lower plane, that of a silver plane? Not at all. Now I will hear the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. COCKRELL. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BLAIR in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri claim the floor?

Mr. McPHERSON. I yield the floor.

Mr. DANIEL. With the consent—

Mr. COCKRELL. I yield to the Senator from Virginia to ask the Senator from New Jersey a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri is on the floor.

Mr. COCKRELL. I yield to the Senator from Virginia to ask the Senator from New Jersey a question, retaining the floor, and I have a right to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia will proceed.

Mr. DANIEL. The Senator from New Jersey says, as I understand him, that the history of the world shows that where there are two coins in circulation the cheaper coin will drive out of circulation the dearer one. Does he mean by that the one that has the more value of metal in it?

Mr. McPHERSON. I do not know what the Senator means by more value of metal.

Mr. DANIEL. In bullion.

Mr. McPHERSON. Not at all. That does not necessarily follow. The quantity of bullion does not make the value of a dollar.

Mr. DANIEL. What does make the value?

Mr. McPHERSON. I suppose the stamp of the Government marks the value of the dollar.

Mr. DANIEL. Is it not true that the history of the United States has recently shown that the cheaper silver dollar drove out of circulation the dearer silver dollar? Did not the trade-dollar of 420 grains fail to circulate when the cheaper dollar of 412½ grains was freely circulated?

Mr. McPHERSON. Most assuredly. The Senator does not pretend to use that as an argument?

Mr. DANIEL. Is it not true, then, that the history of the world does show that the less metal may sometimes drive out the dollar that has a larger value of metal in it?

Mr. McPHERSON. It is useless to go into any discussion over a question that is, to my mind, so plain as that. The Senator knows perfectly well why the trade-dollar was coined. He knows it was not a legal tender; that it was not intended as such; it was not a legal tender for the payment of debts. But the Senator knows another thing, and knows it perfectly well, that if in this country to-day there was a redundancy of coin in the shape of silver dollars, the bullion of which they were made being worth in the market of the world 30 per cent. less than the gold dollar, that dollar would become the only coin currency in use and the only money in circulation.

The history of the world, I repeat, teaches this fact, that the poorer money drives out the dearer money. As evidence of that take any time during our civil war and for many years afterward when we had nothing but greenbacks in circulation. The greenbacks drove out both the gold and silver. We had no money in circulation except the greenbacks. For like reasons to-day, if you continue the coining of the silver dollar until you have a redundancy of silver dollars in this country, that very moment the silver dollar becomes the currency in use, and we shall occupy just exactly the position toward all the commercial nations of the earth that India and other silver countries occupy to-day.

Take the United States of America, a nation almost unlimited in the area of its territory, almost inexhaustible in the fertility of its resources. The idea that such a people as we are, who in the immediate future must become the great commercial and financial center of the world, should be compelled very much longer to occupy the position that if to-day we wanted to pay a bill in China or Japan or in any part of the East we must buy exchange upon London; in other words, that the people of the United States and the bankers of this country must be compelled to pay all their obligations in the East by exchange on London! Why is that? Simply, sir, for the very reason that everybody knows when he gets hold of a bill of exchange on London that it means so much gold. The English sovereign then begins to speak.

The English sovereign is known in every part of this broad world, and just so long as the people of Great Britain maintain their single gold standard into which all the people of the world, whether they are silver countries, or gold countries, or bimetallics, have learned to translate their own coin, just so long as they maintain that advantage, just so long will they have also a commercial advantage.

Therefore it is that I want to see this country maintain the gold standard. I want to have them use just as much silver as can possibly be used in the circulation in this country without endangering the gold standard. But to give free unlimited coinage of silver would be to drive out gold. This would be folly.

And now with respect to this contrivance which is before the Senate I wish to say a single word while upon my feet, that I believe you can go on for some years depositing this bullion in the Treasury and issuing your notes upon it. I believe this money will circulate freely among the people, and I do not think it will interfere very materially with the maintenance of the gold standard, whereas if it were coined into standard silver dollars we should be on a silver basis in the not distant future.

Mr. President, I do not expect to vote for the conference report, and for this reason: Not but that I am in favor of maintaining the gold standard, which the Senator from Missouri is not, but I am opposed—

Mr. COCKRELL. I beg the Senator's pardon; do not say that of me. I said expressly that I am in favor of maintaining the double standard, but not a single gold standard or a single silver standard.

Mr. McPHERSON. I am in favor of maintaining silver upon a parity with gold, if it can be done, but I will not vote to give legal tender to any certificate or to any paper money whatever. I am in favor of making and continuing gold and silver coin as the legal-tender money of this country and nothing else. It is a dangerous power to exercise. It may be safe enough up to the present, but the time may come, under the decision recently made by the Supreme Court of the United States, when there will be no limit to the amount of paper money in this country, uncertain both in the value or quantity, all of which will depend upon the judgment of Congress, or the supposed wants of the people.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from New Jersey has asked rather a long question, but I am always glad to hear him. Now, in regard to the double standard and the methods of maintaining it, his idea seems to be that a double standard can not be maintained unless there is a perfect equality in the market price of the two metals.

Mr. McPHERSON. Or when the cheaper money is so limited in amount that it can be maintained on a parity with the dearer money. What I mean by maintaining on a parity is this, if the Senator will permit me—

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. If you go to the Treasury and demand the money for an obligation due you from the Treasury Department, and you are able to choose and the Treasury is able to permit you to exercise your choice as to what money you will be paid in, whether gold or silver, greenbacks, or national-bank notes, just so long as that can be done just so long will there be no cheap money and no depreciated money in this country. But the very moment that the Treasury is not able to pay every man in the money that he demands or want or seeks, that very moment the people outside of the Treasury will begin to look out for themselves and gold begins to bear a premium. Now, sir, with 360,000,000 silver dollars in this country, with the amount of gold which the Secretary of the Treasury reports as having at his command, I say it is possible, if we have no greater increase of the silver coinage, to continue the payments in gold or silver at the option of the creditor; but when the option becomes one that the Secretary himself must begin to exercise and he must pay out the silver dollars instead of the gold dollars, then silver becomes depreciated. That is the argument.

Now, then, as to the conference bill or the contrivance, as I call it; it does not propose to coin silver dollars except in a very limited amount, and only enough, as I understand it, after 1891 to enable them to make redemption of the Treasury notes. I do not believe the Treasury notes are coming in to be redeemed. I believe that they will be maintained in circulation without any trouble whatever; but you have ceased to coin silver dollars, you have in this way gotten rid of the danger which stands between the coinage of the silver dollar and the maintaining of the parity in gold. In that respect I prefer the conference bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, will the Senator answer me a question?

Mr. McPHERSON. If I can, with pleasure.

Mr. COCKRELL. Suppose that in 1865 the Latin Union, instead of placing any restrictions upon the coinage of silver, had placed the same restrictions upon the coinage of gold, and suppose then that the monetary conference of 1867, which met in Paris and was composed of delegates from all the principal nations of the earth, had recommended unanimously the establishment of the single silver standard and had opposed the gold standard, or double standard in connection with gold; and then suppose that in 1871 Germany had demonetized gold, having in 1857 established the single silver standard and permitted the use of gold. Suppose she had declared then that she intended to maintain the single silver standard and had placed the same restrictions upon gold that she placed upon silver, and then had accomplished that finally in 1873; and suppose that the United States had in 1873 established the single silver standard and had demonetized gold as she had demonetized silver, and then suppose that the Latin Union had closed their mints against gold and the utilization of gold, and then the other European countries had also abandoned the gold standard and established the single silver standard, where do you think to-day would be the market value of gold compared with silver?

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator's question is very much involved. He has so many supposable cases in it that I really do not know that I can follow the whole thread of his question. But if I understand it, he would like to have my opinion as to what would have been the effect if something else had taken place.

Mr. COCKRELL. What would have been the effect, in short, if gold had been treated precisely as silver has been, and if silver had been honored as gold has been?

Mr. McPHERSON. In the first place, the answer to that is very simple. It is not a supposable case at all, because gold is the monopoly money metal. There never has been, there never can be, there never will be such a thing happen in the history of this world as that gold will be discontinued as the principal money metal of the world. There is every reason in its favor. On the other hand, silver is not so valuable as gold. It is more weighty than gold. It is as useful as gold for many of the purposes for which money is used, but as for driving gold out of use as a standard money metal of the world, that is absolutely impossible.

Now, the Senator asks what would have been the effect if the Latin

Union had taken a different course and if the Government of the United States had taken a different course? I believe that if there never had been any disturbance in Germany at the time there was, if Germany had continued to coin silver, if the States of the Latin Union had continued to coin silver, if the Government of the United States had continued its coinage, perhaps to-day silver would have been equal in its bullion value to what it was in 1873 when it was demonetized. But there is this the Senator must take into consideration: That thing has been done. It was done by Germany; and the states of the Latin Union for simple self-protection determined that they must close their mints against the further admission of silver. Then the Government of the United States in 1873 also demonetized silver.

But we are responsible in like manner with the states of the Latin Union and in like manner with Germany. We have discredited silver; we have ourselves discredited the coin in which a part of our debt perhaps would have been paid, and so far as we are responsible for that discrediting just so far are we responsible for the low price of silver to-day. In other words, we have helped to injure it.

Now, then, I claim that the Government of the United States, single-handed and alone, can not restore silver to its proper place among the coinage metals of the world or for the coinage uses of the world. If Germany, if England, if the states of the Latin Union, if the United States of America will all join together, then we may be able to put silver back again to its former position; but without it, it is impossible.

For one, I object. I must positively object to vote in the Senate to have the responsibility taken by the Congress of the United States to restore silver, single-handed and alone, to its former position among the money metals of this country and to coin it to any extent in which it may be brought to the mints to be coined.

Another thing I object to doing. I will never consent that the Government of the United States shall mint, coin, and declare its value far in excess of its bullion value and not do it solely upon Government account. There is no class of people to-day who are paid as large profits upon their industry as the silver miners. Even at the low prices of silver, when selling here at 94 cents per ounce, the cost to the silver miners who produce that silver, according to the statement of Mr. Kimball, the Director of the Mint, and according to the statement of Professor Austin, was less than 52 cents per ounce, and they even get it down in some of the great mines, particularly one in Australia and one, I think, in Montana, where the absolute cost of mining and producing an ounce of silver ore is only about 28 cents.

I say there is no class of people to-day who are paid as large profits upon their industry as are the silver miners; and I am unwilling to allow the miners of silver in this country to come and deposit their product in the mints of the United States and have it coined for them free of expense, and be able then, with a dollar that cost them, according to the Director of the Mint, only 52 cents to produce, to have a debt-paying power of 100 cents. I object to that.

Mr. President, as I said before, I did not intend to say a word on this silver question from the beginning of the controversy to the end, and it had not been for the fact that I wished to know exactly why the Senator from Missouri desired to destroy the gold standard and make this country a second-rate financial and commercial power I probably should have said nothing now. I can not vote for the conference committee's report for the reasons I have stated. I will not vote to make legal tender any money but gold or silver.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I am very thankful to the Senator from New Jersey for answering my question so frankly. It is a question that I have often propounded here to the gold monometallists, and he is the first one who has ever answered it so frankly, truthfully, and correctly. Yet the Senator can not see the folly, I might say, the impracticability, I might say, of making that metal silver with its legal discriminations and weights and impediments now as a mere commodity, the equal of gold metal, which gold metal has all the legal rights, privileges, and qualities of the gold coin.

The Senator has said correctly that if there had been no discrimination against silver, silver to-day would probably be where it was in 1873. I have not a bit of doubt about it. There is no proposition that I think is so well established as that discriminate legislation has caused the depreciation of silver relatively to gold, and the United States is the author and the finisher of that discriminate legislation.

Mr. McPHERSON. No, Germany; Germany began it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I beg pardon; I say the United States is the author and the finisher of that discriminating legislation, and for that reason must take the first step to undo it. Germany in 1857 established the single silver standard. In 1862 the movement was begun by the monometallists of the United States to establish the single gold standard. If the Senator will read those old documents that were published as closely as I have read them he will see the indisputable evidence of the fact.

In 1862 the Commissioner of the General Land Office represented that our mines would yield from $300,000,000 to $400,000,000 of the precious metals annually. In 1863 the representative of the United States at the Berlin Statistical Congress, Mr. Samuel B. Ruggles, told the European nations that we were producing gold and silver to the amount of from $300,000,000 to $400,000,000 or $500,000,000 annually, and the product was simply illimitable; that we would flood the world with the precious metals, and they had to come to one standard or the other, and the United States was willing to take the gold standard. We took the initiative as early as 1863. That report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to the Secretary of the Interior was read to all the continental nations in a statistical congress assembled for the express purpose of agreeing upon weights, measures, and coinage. That was their business. It was taken home to all the nations of the world.

In 1866 and 1867 the Paris International Conference met. This same man, Ruggles, was there, and he again, in co-operation with the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], who was a visitor there, proposed to the nations of the world that we would adopt the gold standard. We forced it upon them. Senator SHERMAN himself said in his report that France had reluctantly yielded to the demands of the United States for the single gold standard. Germany never thought of it until we had started the movement. We demonetized silver, or attempted to do it, before Germany did.

Mr. McPHERSON. Now, may I ask the Senator another question very briefly?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. Inasmuch as we propose under this bill, if it passes, to place in the Treasury four and a half million ounces of silver per month, not to be coined, but to circulate freely as money by the use of the certificate standing before it and doing service as money, is it not a thousand times safer and better for this country to continue to do that for a period of time, until we see what other nations are willing to do towards the restoration of silver coinage? We will have the bullion then in our Treasury, purchased at a low price.

All we have to do is to turn it into the mint and coin it, whereas if silver goes up to 129 per ounce, other nations will have to purchase it at the larger and the higher price. Is it not better, is it not safer, not to step down in the plane upon which our money is based, but to maintain our gold standard, having a sufficiency of money as this bill will give us, enough as I think to satisfy every demand on the part of those who think that we need more money; enough, as I think, to satisfy every reasonable and unreasonable demand on the part of the silver producers for the use of silver, and at the same time a perfectly safe method of doing it? Does not the Senator think that is the best plan to adopt, rather than to undertake single-handed and alone to coin all this metal and take the risk of going on to a silver basis instead of standing upon a gold one, where we now do, and where we can continue to stand?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not agree with the Senator in regard to that. I do not think that this present conference report is in the right direction. I am not going to undertake now to make an argument upon what will bring gold and silver to a perfect equality in the markets of the world as money metals. In my judgment the only proper course for the United States to pursue, since the United States initiated the movement to demonetize silver, since the United States made the misrepresentations and false statements to Europe which induced European nations to abandon the double standard and to adopt the single gold standard, and since the United States has been the author and the finisher of this legal discrimination against silver and in favor of gold, is for the United States to undo what she has done just as quickly as possible. I believe the end will justify it, and that the predictions of our friends who are fearful that the single silver standard will become the sole standard will not be verified.

Mr. President, I was reading from an article in the New York Evening Post. I will continue that article. I am now reading the fifth clause:

5. The Treasury will buy silver bullion at the market price and pay for the same in Treasury notes, making the same profit that it now makes on silver certificates. If the amount of silver offered is no more than sufficient to meet the requirements of the public for circulation, there will be no drain on the Treasury. If the offerings should exceed the public demand for circulation, the drain on the Treasury would be measured by the excess, and the Secretary might be compelled to sell bonds to replenish his gold balance. The act of 1882, establishing the greenback redemption reserve of $100,000,000 gold, remains un repealed. Logically, all the acts taken together require the Secretary to sell bonds to replenish this fund whenever it is reduced below $100,000,000. It is not impossible that resort may be had to this power before President Harrison's term expires, especially if the requirements for new pensions exceed the estimates of the Pension Committee of the Senate, namely, $43,000,000.

The very contingency which the Senator from Colorado yesterday laughed at, this paper says may happen during the present Administration. Now, I will finish reading this article:

Looked at from the standpoint of the science of finance, the bill is tremendously absurd, but that is not the true point of view. The bill is a compromise of conflicting whimsies and conflicting interests. We doubt whether the Senate will accept it, but if it does so, the country may be congratulated on not getting a worse measure.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL]—I do not see him now in his seat—told me if I had not introduced a certain bill on the 27th day of January, 1890. I did introduce Senate bill 2339, January 27, 1890. It was referred to the Committee on Finance, and I believe has been reported adversely by that committee. I want to read that bill and show the difference between that and the compromise measure of the Finance Committee. The Senator from Oregon intended to make the impression that that bill was very similar to the compromise measure now pending. The bill I introduced says in the first section:

That so much of the act of February 28, 1878, as authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury "to purchase from time to time silver bullion at the market price thereof, not less than $2,000,000 worth per month nor more than $4,000,000 worth per month," be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and the Secretary shall hereafter purchase from time to time silver bullion, the product of the mines of the United States, or of ores smelted or refined in the United States, at the market price thereof, not less than $5,000,000 worth per month, and cause the same to be coined monthly as fast as purchased into standard silver dollars, as provided for in said act, and the amount of money necessary to make such purchases is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Missouri suspend a moment? The hour of 2 o'clock has arrived, and it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. HARRIS. This is a privileged question.

Mr. COCKRELL. The hour of 2 o'clock has passed, but I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has arrived.

Mr. COCKRELL. It has passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3738) to place the American merchant marine engaged in the foreign trade upon an equality with that of other nations.

Mr. FRYE. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid aside informally.

Mr. COCKRELL. I was just going to make that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be made. The Senator from Missouri will proceed on the conference report.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am reading now the bill that I introduced last January. It proceeds:

And whenever the Secretary of the Treasury can not purchase such silver bullion at a market price less than 99 cents for 412½ grains of such silver bullion of standard fineness, then such silver bullion shall be received and disposed of in like manner as gold bullion, and any gain or seigniorage from coinage under this act shall be accounted for and paid into the Treasury as provided by existing law.

"In like manner as gold bullion." Free coinage, unlimited coinage, the placing of silver bullion on a perfect equality with gold bullion. That is my bill. Then the second section provides:

That all laws and parts of laws authorizing the issue of gold certificates and silver certificates upon the deposit of gold coin or bullion or standard silver dollars are hereby repealed; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required, upon deposit with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, or any superintendent of any mint of the United States by any holder of gold coin or bullion or standard silver dollars or such silver bullion of standard weight and fineness, when the market price of such silver bullion is not less than 99 cents for 412½ grains, to issue therefor, in the denominations now authorized by law, coin certificates, which shall be receivable for all debts, customs, and dues to the United States, and shall be redeemable at the pleasure of the United States in either gold coin or standard silver dollars, and when so received or redeemed shall be reissued, and the coin and bullion so deposited for or representing such certificates shall be retained in the Treasury for such redemption of said certificates.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required to cancel and destroy all the existing gold and silver certificates as far as they are received or redeemed by the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, and to issue at once in lieu thereof coin certificates hereinafter authorized of like denominations with the gold and silver certificates so received or redeemed; and the coin certificates herein authorized when held by any national-banking association shall be counted as part of its lawful reserve.

That bill proposed the free and unlimited coinage of silver and the placing of silver upon a perfect equality with gold by the law and under the law, and with all the privileges and rights of gold, the moment it was brought up to 99 cents on the dollar; and there is not a line and not a word in the pending bill which authorizes free coinage of silver. I tell the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], now present, that there is not a line in this bill which will ever bring free and unlimited coinage of silver. There is no provision of the kind. Silver could go to $1.10 for 412½ grains, and you have not got free coinage under this bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. Suppose it goes to $1.29, what then?

Mr. COCKRELL. It makes no difference; I mean for 412½ grains. Silver may go to a premium of 10 per cent. over gold and you have not got free coinage under this bill, not a bit of it, sir. I challenge the Senator, and I challenge any Senator, to show where there is any provision in this bill for the free and unlimited coinage of silver. It is not in this bill. It is a fraud. It is not intended to give free and unlimited coinage to silver. I challenge the Senator to take it up and show one line which indicates that there is ever to be a time when the holder of silver bullion can go and deposit it as the holder of gold bullion does, although that silver bullion may be worth 25 per cent. more than the gold bullion. It is not in the bill.

Did ever any friend of silver see such a fraud? Think of it, Mr. President! Here you pretend to restore the free coinage of silver, and you have not one solitary provision in this compromise measure which will ever permit the holder of silver bullion to deposit it and have it coined as the holder of gold bullion can, although that silver bullion of 412½ grains, nine parts fine, may be worth 10 or 20 or 50 per cent. more than 25.8 grains of gold is worth. Talk to me about this being in the direction of the recognition and establishment of equality between silver and gold! It is infinitely worse than the present law. It is a worse discrimination than the present law against silver.

Mr. President, I have read from the New York Evening Post, but some of my friends upon the opposite side of the Chamber may not consider that the New York Evening Post is the right kind of absolute authority on financial questions, which sometimes assume a political shape, and for the edification of my friends upon the opposite side I propose now to read from the New York Daily Tribune, of Wednesday, July 9, 1890, the organ, the official organ, of a great political party in the United States.

Mr. DAWES. Is it?

Mr. COCKRELL. Does not everybody acknowledge that? I supposed everybody did. It is recognized among all Democrats as the official organ of the Republican party. I supposed there was no Republican Senator who questioned that. It is recognized as the organ of the gold monometallists of the country. Now, I do hope my distinguished friend from Nevada [Mr. JONES], the great silver-tongued champion of silver, will take this home and meditate upon it and see how completely he has abandoned every claim of right to represent silver. I read from this editorial:

THE LATEST SILVER BILL.

Senator SHERMAN and Representatives CONGER and WALKER have doubtless done in conference committee the best that they judged to be possible. They made an earnest and persistent effort for the bullion-redemption clause, and for limitation of silver purchases to $4,500,000 worth, instead of 4,500,000 ounces. But their final assent to the bill upon which all the Republican members of the conference committee have agreed must be taken as assurance that they consider the measure safe, and the best obtainable at this session.

This bill—

Now listen—

This bill requires the purchase of 4,500,000 ounces of silver, "or"—

"Or"—

"so much thereof as may be offered, in each month, at the market price thereof." If there is an attempt to force up the price of silver none may be offered—

None may be offered—and in that case none will be purchased for the month.

Only one day upon which to offer it, and the price having been forced up none is offered at the price fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. COCKRELL. With pleasure.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator understand that any could be purchased under existing law unless it was offered?

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, he is bound to purchase it.

Mr. SPOONER. How can he purchase it unless it is offered?

Mr. COCKRELL. He has got to hunt it up and buy it. It is a compulsory law. There is no discretion about it.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will allow me—

Mr. COCKRELL. With pleasure.

Mr. MITCHELL. It takes two to make a bargain.

Mr. SPOONER. I have always understood that it took at least two men to make a contract, one man who had the ability and the desire to buy, if it is a contract to purchase, and another who had the commodity to sell and was willing to sell. Does the Senator from Missouri understand that to be the fact?

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, Mr. President, ordinarily two persons—

Mr. SPOONER. You can not condemn it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Ordinarily two persons have to agree mutually to an exchange of commodities, or to sell one commodity for another; but where there is an excess of a commodity in the market, and there is a purchaser for only a part of it, the Secretary can always get it at some price.

Mr. SPOONER. That is, at the market price.

Mr. COCKRELL. It may be or it may not be what it is selling at among other parties.

Mr. SPOONER. But there is such a thing as a market price.

Mr. COCKRELL. If the Senator undertakes to say that the market price is whatever is offered, let it be at the market price. This paper says that the Secretary has a discretion, and if the price is run up none will be offered at the price fixed by the Secretary.

Mr. MITCHELL. But the bill does not say that.

Mr. SPOONER. We are not adopting the paper, we are discussing the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. We are discussing the legal and judicial interpretation of the bill as given by the organ of some great political party.

Mr. SPOONER. But I wanted the Senator's legal interpretation upon it, not a Republican newspaper's legal interpretation upon it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Under the present law—

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator answer my question?

Mr. COCKRELL. I am going to answer it.

Mr. SPOONER. Does he understand that under the present law silver can be compulsorily purchased by the Secretary unless some one has it to sell and is willing to sell it?

Mr. COCKRELL. No; if the Secretary, under the present law, can not find in the world anywhere a man who will sell him $2,000,000 worth of silver bullion, he can not buy, but if he can find under the shining canopy of heaven any man, of any race, color, or condition, who is willing to sell his silver bullion, the Secretary of the Treasury is compellable to purchase it to the extent of $2,000,000 worth a month. There is no compulsion in this proposed law.

Mr. SPOONER. He is obliged to purchase it under the bill if anybody has it to sell.

Mr. COCKRELL. I beg pardon, not a bit of it. The Secretary of the Treasury is directed to purchase 4,500,000 ounces, "or so much thereof as may be offered."

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President—

Mr. COCKRELL. It must be offered. This bill declares that it must be offered to the Secretary, not that he is to hunt it up and buy it. Under the present law the Secretary must hunt it up; he must ransack the earth.

Mr. PADDOCK. But he must buy it when it is offered.

Mr. COCKRELL. He must find it under the present law, if it is in the world and can be purchased at all. Under the pending bill it must be offered, and there are the catch-words in this bill.

Mr. PADDOCK. But under this proposed law if it is offered the Secretary must buy it within the limits fixed in the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. At the price the Secretary has fixed.

Mr. PADDOCK. Not at the price the Secretary has fixed, but at the market price. That matter was pretty fully discussed here yesterday, and I thought the debate reached a point where the Senator might readily admit that "the market price" was the market price which the world recognized.

Mr. COCKRELL. I explained that yesterday, but I did not then have the judicial opinion of the great Republican organ of the United States to sustain me. Now I have it, and I am quoting it to sustain every position I took yesterday. Now, let me read it. The Senator from Nebraska did not hear it, I know. I am reading from the New York Tribune—The New York Daily Tribune of to-day.

Mr. PADDOCK. The New York Tribune is not the bill. We are not voting upon statements of either Republican or Democratic organs outside of this Chamber, but on the proposition under discussion here, which is to be determined by the votes of Senators.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think I once heard a distinguished Republican Senator, not now in his seat, intimate that the Secretary of the Treasury for many years had always listened to Wall street, and that by reading what Wall street said you could tell what the Secretary of the Treasury would do. Now, I am reading this, and I hope the Senator from Nebraska will not dispute the authority of this judicial organ. I will read it again:

This bill requires the purchase of 4,500,000 ounces of silver, "or so much thereof as may be offered, in each month, at the market price thereof." If there is an attempt to force up the price of silver none may be offered, and in that case none will be purchased for the month. When there is expectation that the price will advance offerings may naturally fall below the limit, and consequently purchases may be curtailed.

That is the way it will be done. That is the way Wall street will manage it. I read on:

Coinage at the rate of $2,000,000 monthly is continued until July 1, 1891, but stopped after that date except in such amounts "as may be necessary to provide for the redemption of the Treasury notes." Continued coinage for another year is foolish, but not important. The provision for free coinage when silver shall have reached par is stricken out, and that is a definite and important gain.

Did the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], now in front of me, hear this language? I want the distinguished Senator from Colorado to hear this language. I want the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] in front of me to hear this language:

The provision for free coinage when silver shall have reached par is stricken out, and that is a definite and important gain.

There is no free coinage about this bill, not a scintilla of it. It is the demonetization of silver, absolute and unqualified. I challenge any Senator to show where it even squints in the direction of free coinage. And yet the great champion of silver, the distinguished Senator from Nevada, comes out and champions this subterfuge and surrender of every principle involved in the Senate bill as it was passed by this body by an overwhelming majority. I read further from this official organ:

The Treasury notes to be issued for silver bullion will represent its market value and not its coinage value. The provision for their safety is this:

"Upon demand of the holder of any of the Treasury notes herein provided for, the Secretary of the Treasury shall, under such regulations as he may prescribe, redeem such notes in gold or silver coin, at his discretion, it being the established policy of the United States to maintain the two metals on a parity with each other upon the present legal ratio, or such ratio as may be provided by law."

Now, I want the Senator from Nevada to hear what the official organ says this means:

The latter clause will, at first glance, seem empty and foolish to many—

Empty and foolish to many—but the Secretary has no power, under this provision, to redeem in silver coin while that coin is not, in market value of bullion contained, "on a parity with" gold, because such redemption would defeat the purpose declared.

Is not that the interpretation which I gave to it? Is not that the interpretation which the Senator from Nevada and also the Senators from Colorado and Oregon undertook to evade? I say it is the interpretation gold monometallists give to it. It is the interpretation that a gold monometallist Secretary of the Treasury will give to it.

But the Secretary—

Listen to this—

has no power under this provision to redeem in silver coin while that coin is not, in market value of bullion contained, "on a parity with" gold, because such redemption would defeat the purpose declared.

If silver should reach par he could redeem in silver coin. Otherwise he must redeem "under such regulations as he may prescribe" in gold coin, and he has ample power under provisions of the redemption act to sell bonds for gold in order to redeem Treasury notes. True, the new notes proposed are not precisely those which the Treasury was authorized to redeem in 1879, but they are of precisely the same legal character, and the redemption of the old legal-tender notes from the bullion fund would at any time give the Secretary authority to purchase more gold for the replenishment of that fund.

The new notes provided are to be a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, "except where otherwise stipulated in the contract." This latter clause avoids the obvious impropriety of invalidating or altering private contracts which have been or may be made on a gold basis. Its result will be a material increase in the number of contracts so made. With that provision the grant of legal-tender quality to the notes proposed is of no practical importance; it will not make the notes worth the thousandth part of a cent more if redemption in gold should at any time fail. But a nation which has paid a thousand millions of debt within ten years can not suffer redemption to fail without crime.

This compromise has been accepted by all the Republican members of the conference, Messrs. SHERMAN, JONES, CONGER, and WALKER. When it has passed both Houses there will be time to discuss certain of its practical results.

They know where they are. They know exactly the advantages they have under this surrender, and they are not going to tell them all; but they tell enough here to convince their gold monometallist friends that they have nothing to fear from this measure.

The silver Senators who have contended for free coinage have this definite reason for accepting the conference measure without delay; probably none more nearly approaching their views could by any possibility receive the President's approval, and with no action at this session their position would not be enviable.

Poor, deluded Senators favoring silver, the distinguished Senator from Nevada and others, have been driven from every position they have occupied, and they have to take this position in order to avoid being in an unenviable position in the future.

No, Mr. President, this bill is in my judgment infinitely worse than the present law, and there is no comparison between this bill and the bill as passed by the Senate. The bill as passed by the Senate, I believe, if the Senate rejects this conference report, we can yet get adopted when it shall have been brought before some deliberative representative body. That bill places gold and silver upon a perfect equality. It took the silver metal from its degraded position under the law and put it upon a perfect equality before the law with its brother metal gold; and when that is done by law there will be an equality between them in value, and it is the duty of the United States to restore that equality before the law.

The Senate bill gave to silver all the legal powers and rights and incidents held by gold to-day. That is right. This bill gives to silver none of the incidents of gold, not one of them. It absolutely stops coining under the present law after one year. It does not take effect for thirty days after the date of its passage, I believe. There will then be only some eleven months left in which we can have a coinage of $2,000,000 per month of silver, and then we have silver in the United States a mere commodity, a mere article of merchandise. We have placed it in the warehouse called the subtreasury; and what will my distinguished friend from Ohio say when the Farmers' National Alliance and the Labor Union shall present their demands before the Finance Committee for the establishment of a subtreasury for the deposit of cotton, tobacco, wheat, and oats? If silver is only merchandise, if silver is only a commodity, if silver has none of the qualities of money, why not treat these other commodities as you treat it? There is but one answer to the question.

I am therefore opposed to this compromise surrender by the conference committee. Let us reject this conference report. Let us send it back. Let us tell the conferees of the other House that we adhere to the bill that was passed by the Senate by an overwhelming majority, and they will yield in the end.

We are asked to surrender at the first fire. We are to hoist the white flag. We are to retreat in disorder. We are to abandon all the pretensions we have made in behalf of silver. We give truthfulness to the assertion of the monometallists of the East that it was only a plan to furnish a market for silver bullion. I deny it. I did not support the bill for the purpose of furnishing a home market for the product of our silver mines. If we did not produce an ounce of silver in the United States, I would still support the Senate bill. All the Eastern gold monometallists have charged that this movement was a movement of the owners of silver mines and silver bullion for the purpose of providing a market for their product, and they will say now "Did we not tell you so? They have got a warehouse for the storage of their silver bullion and now they are satisfied."

Mr. HISCOCK. What Eastern monometallists have ever charged that the free coinage—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. COCKRELL. With a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. HISCOCK. What Eastern monometallists have ever charged that the free coinage of silver was pressed for the purpose of affording a market for silver?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think there is a paper in the East that has been opposing the silver movement which has not charged that very thing, and I will leave it to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] to verify what I say.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have failed yet—and I read the newspapers very carefully—to notice the charge that the free coinage of silver was for the purpose of furnishing a market for the American production. The Eastern people do not believe any such thing, that the effect of free coinage would be to furnish a market for the American product.

Mr. COCKRELL. I know how generous the distinguished Senator from New York now is in the hour of triumph and victory, but I will leave the Senator from Colorado to tell what these men have charged. It has been charged on this floor, and the RECORD shows it; it was charged only this morning by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. McPHERSON]; it has been charged all around; it has been charged by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], the chairman of the Finance Committee. Who has not charged it? I ask the Senator from New York to point out some Senator who has favored the single gold standard who has not indirectly made this charge, to point to some leading gold monometallist paper that has not, indirectly at least, made the charge. He can not point out one.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not know of any Senator on this side of the Chamber who has argued in favor of a gold standard except as the two metals are held together.

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, yes.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not know of any Senator who has taken that position. I certainly have not.

Mr. COCKRELL. In other words, you mean when a Senator says to silver, bucked and gagged, bound hand and foot under all manner of proscriptions and discriminations, flat on its back, and gold enrobed in its monopoly robes, and standing before the world equipped with all the requisites of money—when you say to silver, "Stand up by your brother metal, stand up like a man, and be on an equality with gold," and because silver does not rise and come up to a perfect equality as a metal, so bound and discriminated against, you say it will not do to give it any of the requisites of gold; it will not do to give it equality! Sir, give it equality, give it manhood, give it legal manhood, and let it stand upon a perfect equality with its twin brother, gold, and that white metal will maintain its character and standing as a money metal in the markets of the world, and always has done it. God in His infinite wisdom has not so distributed it throughout the world that it can be produced in unlimited quantities like tin or copper or any of the baser metals. It never has been produced in the history of this world in greater quantities than would answer for monetary purposes, and no nation has ever been cursed with a depreciated coinage—you have had depreciated paper, but you can not point to a nation on the earth that has had depreciated silver or gold unless it was debased and degraded by being reduced in fineness and quality.

Mr. President, I am in favor of restoring silver to its perfect equality before the law. Endow it with all the functions of money, give it the power and the rights and the privileges that you give to gold, and it will maintain its equality with gold. It is idle, it is childish, it is whimsical to talk about silver ever appreciating to an equality with gold while you keep it bound down by legal discriminations and proscriptions.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I shall endeavor to look at this compromise measure just as it is, without attempting to exaggerate the interpretation of it or to regard it in anything but the light of a common-sense interpretation.

I do not concur to the full extent with some of the criticisms which have been pronounced upon its language. When this bill says—

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to purchase from time to time silver bullion to the aggregate amount of 4,500,000 ounces, or so much thereof as may be offered, in each month, at the market price thereof, not exceeding $1 for 371.25 grains of pure silver—

I take that only to signify what it strikes the mind at first blush to signify, that the Secretary of the Treasury is to buy that much silver if that silver is offered upon the market at the market price. It does not say that it shall be offered to the Secretary of the Treasury. It means, as I understand it and as the plain significance of the words would seem to me to import, that he is to buy upon the market at the market offering, and as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is in his seat I beg leave to inquire of him if that is not the intent and purpose of this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I stated yesterday in my statement as to the conference report that that was my view of it, that the Secretary of the Treasury was bound to buy 4,500,000 ounces, whatever may be his opinion, and he is bound to pay the market price of silver each month, and that his failure to do so would not only be a breach of public duty, but would be an impeachable offense.

Mr. DANIEL. That, then, is the plain English of this provision. While the language is a little different from what has been used in other bills, it is not different in its significance. There might be the criticism that it is capable of being perverted and tortured, as it has been by some newspaper reports, into a different significance, but I do not think that a sound lawyer or any one who will study and weigh the language that is here employed would fairly or justly construe these words as meaning any other or different thing than that.

While, therefore, I would say that it might have been better that this bill should have followed the language contained in others without any addition thereto, I do not think that this language should be sufficient to lead us in our judgment to vote against the measure were it otherwise responsive to the demands of the country and to the exigencies of the times.

I go further and say in speaking about this bill that I am ready to concede to those who advocate its provisions that it would be much better that this bill should pass than that Congress should fail in legislating upon this subject.

The one great point which can be truly urged in advocacy of this bill—we shall gain nothing in looking at it otherwise than as it is—is that this bill will greatly increase the volume of currency of the people of the United States. It is true that it does not so greatly increase that volume of currency as one might at first conceive. When the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to purchase 4,500,000 ounces of silver per month and when the argument is made that that much more will be turned into money, it is not entirely correct, for this bill does not require the 4,500,000 ounces of silver either to be coined into money or to swell the volume of our currency by a corresponding volume of paper money.

In other words, a portion of this large volume of silver which is thus directed to be purchased is simply bought and hoarded in the Treasury and does not reappear from the Treasury either in the form of silver dollars or in the form of legal-tender paper representatives. And if the arguments which the gold-standard men and the Treasury of the United States, through its official representatives, have urged upon the people were correct, this bill would be more objectionable to the Secretary of the Treasury and to the gold men in that respect than any bill which has ever been presented, because it is measurably and partially a bill simply for the purchase and hoarding away of silver bullion.

It has been argued in Congress, through successive years and in every phrase that could attract the ear, that the Treasury of the United States should not be burdened as a storage place of useless silver bullion or money; and now, in order, as we may well presume, to place Congress in affiliation with the executive powers that be, it is proposed to buy and to hoard bullion without permitting its use to a degree as money in any form.

Why do I say this, Mr. President? It is because of the provision in the second section of this bill. After providing that Treasury notes shall be issued to pay for the bullion that is purchased, instead of providing that that bullion so purchased shall be turned into money or shall be emitted by the paper legal-tender representative, it says:

But no greater or less amount of such notes shall be outstanding at any time than the cost of the silver bullion and the standard silver dollars coined therefrom then held in the Treasury purchased by such notes.

So that, while in the first section of the bill he who reads it would be led to presume that by this immense purchase of silver our volume of currency would be correspondingly enlarged, we find in the second section that it is immediately restrained and that it is to be measured, not by the amount of the bullion, but by the commodity price of silver. In consenting to this provision, as I humbly conceive, those who believe that silver ought to be coined and used as money upon a parity with gold have conceded too much and have to an extent given away the force and strength of the position which they have heretofore assumed and which has already won the judgment of the country.

Mr. President, it is to be observed, and it can hardly be denied by any one, that, in all the forums of free debate in this country where mind is licensed to combat with mind and argument to oppose argument with unrestrained intercourse, silver money has won this battle. Never before in the history of this country did silver occupy so high a vantage ground in public opinion as that which it holds here and now; and if it be shorn of its fair proportions, if the logic which has won to the silver standard the judgment of the men of intellect and the men of patriotism in this land be followed, there is no more doubt that this Congress would not adjourn without leaving a free-coinage bill upon the statute-books than there is that the hand would continue to turn upon the clock and that one day should bring forth another. There is no better indication or demonstration of the truth of my assertion than the enunciation of the Republican party at Chicago in 1888 when it nominated Benjamin Harrison as President of the United States.

We all know, and it is a matter of public history and of universal understanding that the Republican party has reluctantly come into acquiescence with silver money. It has come to the silver standard like the "whining school-boy with his shining morning face unwillingly to school." But East and West and North and South assembled in Chicago, and there are no bodies of more astuteness than the great political conventions which nominate our Presidents. They are not within the restraint of that close representative relation which they occupy when they become Senators and Representatives in Congress. They have a freer range for the expression of opinion, and when this great body of representative Republicans assembled at Chicago two years ago they declared to this nation, and they invited support for their candidate by criticism upon the propositions which have been embodied in this bill, and by saying that they were in favor of the use of both silver and gold, not as currency, not as a circulating medium, not as a subsidiary coinage, not as an adjunct to the Treasury, but "AS MONEY."

Twice the Democratic Secretary of the Treasury had recommended some such provision as this. The Republican party in mass convention assembled criticised him for doing it and denounced him; and "silver as money" was the shibboleth which it inscribed upon its banner, and that shibboleth won the victory.

Mr. President, furthermore I can not concur in all the criticisms which have been made here upon the language which has been put in the body of this bill. The principle enunciated in that language I concur with. In the second section it is provided:

That upon demand of the holder of any of the Treasury notes herein provided for, the Secretary of the Treasury shall, under such regulations as he may prescribe, redeem such notes in gold or silver coin, at his discretion, it being the established policy of the United States to maintain the two metals on a parity with each other upon the present legal ratio, or such ratio as may be provided by law.

I would much dislike, Mr. President, to see any advocate of the double standard or any one who seeks now to make silver equal before the law in all respects with gold oppose the principle which is enunciated there. The great object, as I understand, and so understanding it I have followed it, of those who seek to reverse the policy which has been practiced about silver is that the two precious metals shall everywhere maintain their parity with each other, and that those usages of the Treasury Department, those acts of legislation, those practices in the banking world which have tended to separate the two metals should be reversed and that they should be recognized and used with impartial hand as the legal equals in the making of money.

But, Mr. President, the historical recital in that insertion in this bill I object to. The silver men have sought that it should become the established policy of the United States to maintain the two metals on a parity with each other. What I object to about the language is that it is a misrecital of past history, for that policy is not yet established; and, second, it is a contradiction of the terms of the bill.

When did it become the established policy of the United States to maintain the two metals on a parity with each other upon the present legal ratio or such ratio as may be provided by law? It was not the established policy of the United States in 1867, when distinguished gentlemen were advocating the single gold standard. It was not the established policy of the United States in 1873, when silver was absolutely dismissed from circulation. It was not the established policy in 1878, when even the partial restoration of silver was denounced by the same gentlemen who, on both sides of this House, both Democrats and Republicans, reiterated their prophecies that anything for the benefit of silver was going to injure the country.

It is not the established policy now, and this bill will not establish it; and that is the reason why I can not vote for it. If it were the established policy of the United States to maintain the two metals at a parity, that policy would find its expression in acts tending to build up that portion of silver which had departed in value from gold. But the policy practiced by the United States Government during the last fifteen or twenty years in everything that has been done by its Executive has been to make the gap wider between the two metals. It was not the established policy of this Government in 1884-'85, when Mr. Cleveland undertook to extinguish the Democratic sentiment of the House of Representatives. It was not the established policy when that House failed to vote for the free coinage of silver, and it is not the established policy now amongst those who yet hold the dominant hand, although they have not the corresponding forces of popular sentiment at their back to sanction it, if silver would deploy its forces and maintain its front position with a firm and equal and unconceding hand.

Mr. President, it is a delicate thing in one department of this Government to refer to those who have the responsibility of administering another. I share with those who have so much respect for the office of the President of the United States and for its occupant that I am loath to make any criticism upon that department of our Government, but I do not transcend the limits of parliamentary courtesy or the comity which should exist between all departments of our Government, to whatever political organization he may belong, when I advert to the fact that the shadow of the White House has fallen across the Congress Hall and that the executive extinguisher is at work, just as it has been for the last fifteen or twenty years, to put out the flame of silver money as fast as it burns up, fed from the very hearts of the people by all that they can give to maintain and make it flame.

Mr. President, we have been told over and over again in recent years that the executive department of the Government was impeding acts of legislation and that the veto had appeared too often in our legislative history. It has come to this now that the very shadow of a veto can reverse a triumphant majority, and that this great body, the greatest parliamentary body, as I conceive, in the world—that this great body of free debate should surrender at the very vague intimation brought by the birds of the air that a veto is possible. Sir, I would not conjure my associates in this body to any step which I would not myself take if I were in the situation which they occupy, nor can I with justice to political history very bitterly reproach them if they recede too quickly before the apprehension of Executive interference.

My observation of public men and of public affairs in the last few years, while not as extensive as that of other gentlemen who are here, has induced me to feel and know what is the great power and influence of the executive administration of our Government. Men who have personal independence of character, men who have strength of intellectual conviction, men who stand up before the public and advocate their views careless of their political fortunes if they may only subserve the principles which they seek to establish, when they become allied in political organizations and under the influences which are brought about the great Capitol and under the persuasive voice of comradeship and under the apprehension of perhaps upsetting the political vantage ground of their chief in executive office, bow and bend and surrender and the people's cause is broken down by their concessions. We have seen it in the Democratic party, for in their organization and political movements parties do not greatly differ with each other.

It is the doctrines and principles which parties stand for that constitute their great difference. Their practices are likely sooner or later much to resemble each other. And if I ask the silver men here, without regard to whether they be Democrats or Republicans, to stand to their guns, I only ask them to do what I have myself done under the same circumstances and what the silver men have got to resolve to do if they ever carry their standard to complete victory. I am willing to die with them in the last ditch if we have got to be driven into it. But I do not want to die, on a triumphant march, of Executive sunstroke. Let us die, if need be, when our time comes, but do not let us run out and meet our time half way and invite it to come.

This silver question is a great deal bigger than the President of the United States, whether his name be Benjamin Harrison or Grover Cleveland, and it is never going to be won as it ought to be by the triumphant and complete vindication of those policies which the silver men stand for until the Senate of the United States is as great as the question. The question is greater than the Senate and greater than the President, and unless the Senate and the House of Representatives are smaller than either they will never give up the vantage ground that has been gained, but will reply to those who oppose that policy, which is the best for this whole nation, like that gallant officer who, when challenged to surrender, answered, "Come and take me."

Mr. President, the language which is used in the discussion of this question is language which has the flavor of the Treasury Department in it. There is a great deal of difference in the way that a case is stated. I have heard good lawyers, criticising the members of their profession, say that they regarded as in the foremost ranks the men who could make the clearest and best statement of the case. A good case clearly stated is more than half won. The gentlemen who want to see the single gold standard in this country generally know how to state their case. I bow in admiration to them, although I must say that they do not always state it in strict conformity to the facts.

I hear, for instance, the Senator from New Jersey say and I hear gentlemen upon the other side say now and then that we must preserve the gold standard. Well, that sounds very well, for we do not want to see the two metals parted; but we are not now upon any gold standard. I utterly deny and dispute the premises that the United States is to-day a gold-standard nation, and if the Senator from New Jersey can show me or if any gentleman can point me to a fact that makes this a gold standard nation, that does not belong to the realm of that discretion which sometimes in the Secretary of the Treasury overrides and disappoints the law, he would be giving me information of which I am at present devoid.

Why will you speak of preserving a standard that does not exist? I know that I may be told that in 1873, when silver was demonetized, it was declared in a statute that the gold dollar should be the unit of value, and at that time we did move toward a single gold standard, but that legislation has been reversed. In 1878 when you remonetized silver you renewed the double standard, and whether the old lines graven upon the statute-book at a time when you were coming to a single gold standard remain there or not, you have practically and legally under your Constitution and laws abandoned the gold standard.

The Senator from New Jersey this morning asked a good many questions and answered a good many, but he did not anywhere tell us where in the laws of this nation he derived the opinion that we are now upon any gold standard.

Mr. President, these words "standards" and "units of value" are sometimes used without the mind going with them into any precise meaning. What do you mean by a unit or standard of value? You mean the medium of payment. There is not an appropriation bill that has passed this body this year that does not recognize the fact that gold is not our standard of value. The appropriations to your rivers and harbors, the appropriations to your armies and navies, the appropriations to your pensioners, and for your own salaries which you put into your pockets remind you every time you receive them that this is not a gold-standard country.

The standard of valuation is that money in which credits may be discharged; your legal-tender money is your standard of value. The whole volume of your currency, not the paper that is in a greenback, not the silver that is in a silver dollar, not the gold that is in a gold dollar, but your whole volume of currency is your standard of valuation of your whole property and your whole obligation. The mass is a homogeneous mass of money, the property is a homogeneous mass of property, the obligations of the country are a homogeneous mass of debt, but your standard of valuation is your whole volume of currency and its units are ideal things for the purpose of subdivision, called dollars; your greenback dollar or your silver dollar and your gold dollar are in their combined value separated by units of dollars and not by units of paper or metal of either of your standards of value. It is what you can pay the debt in that measures the value of the credit.

I object to this bill because it has a tendency—not the effect, but a tendency—not to preserve a gold standard of value, but to create one. It places vast power in the hands of those who, being astute in the use of words, use them according to the Talleyrand idea of concealing thought. Your silver here is purchased at commodity value, and your silver bullion by this act is never given a money value; that is, the value which attaches to metal which can become money.

When the Senator from New Jersey was speaking he said that the history of the world disclosed the fact and proved it. He announced it in quite an ex cathedra fashion, as if he was disposing of history by the declaration that the history of the world disclosed the fact that the cheap money always drives out the dearer. Mr. President, not only does history fail to disclose any such fact, but the Senator from New Jersey has illustrated in his assumption the truth of the maxim of the French philosopher who tells us that we seldom notice what occurs under our own eyes daily; we see the mountains in the distance and we stand upon the shore and look upon the playing of the waves of history, and then we announce very dogmatically and conclusively and exactly what those distant things are; but we seldom notice what occurs under our own eyes and ears.

If the Senator who made that declaration would only observe his own daily transactions he would see his history refuted. You have $346,000,000 of the cheapest money in this world in circulation in the United States, the greenbacks. They cost nothing but printer's ink and paper. Have they driven away your gold? Have they driven away your silver? Have they not now power to get hold of 4,500,000 ounces of silver per month and pull it to us?

Furthermore, there is an illustration under the Senator's eyes that occurred in this House a year or two ago, when, as if to refute the doctrines and declarations of those who were speaking, the dearer money came crawling up to the Halls of Congress in forma pauperis, hat in hand, upon its knee, craving and begging that 420 grains of silver—the dearer money—came and gathered around the lobby and begged and besought to be admitted to be redeemed in cheap silver of 412½ grains legal tender.

Mr. McPHERSON. If the Senator will allow me—

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. Prior to the passage of the resumption act what was then the market value, so to speak, of the so-called greenback? It will be remembered that prior to the passage of the resumption act the greenbacks, or the national currency, were selling payable in gold something like, I think at one time, about 260 per cent. discount. After the passage of the resumption act, when the greenbacks were made payable in gold after a certain date, the greenbacks appreciated up to par with gold. As they are made redeemable in gold and all that have been offered have been redeemed, the Senator can hardly say that the simple fact of making them redeemable and payable in gold had no effect as to their value.

Mr. DANIEL. I have not made any declaration of that sort. I have not alluded to that question. I have merely stated that the Senator has got history wrong and that the cheaper money does not always drive out the dearer.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator cited as an illustration the greenbacks. I should like to ask the Senator now to put the question in a different form. Where were the gold and silver of which the Senator speaks before the passage of the resumption act? Was any of it found in the country?

Mr. DANIEL. I will tell the Senator what was the matter with the greenbacks. I do not like to allude to the war or anything of that sort, having been a Confederate soldier, but the uncertainty of the issue had a good deal to do with weakening their value, for how the war was going to turn out people did not know.

Mr. McPHERSON. The war had closed, if the Senator will permit me, in 1865. There was not a single Confederate soldier, mounted or on foot, within the whole confines of the Confederacy from 1865 to 1873 or 1874; and the greenbacks then, as the Senator knows, were very much depreciated in value. When you undertook to purchase property with them you found the property was very much increased in value. But the very moment the Government proposed a mode in which it agreed to redeem those greenbacks in gold, in coin, that very moment they appreciated. Therefore the Senator can hardly say that this cheap money of which he has spoken to-day, the greenbacks, after they were made payable in gold, were any longer cheap money. If the Senator or myself had a quantity of greenbacks we could take them to the Treasury to-day and demand gold for them. I presume gold would be paid to us. Therefore the greenbacks are as good as gold, and they can not be said to be depreciated.

Mr. DANIEL. Now I will with pleasure endeavor to answer the Senator's question. Does he mean to say that the greenbacks are redeemable in gold or in coin? I ask him that question.

Mr. MCPHERSON. In the first place I will answer the Senator's question and I will answer it very frankly.

Mr. DANIEL. I do not care to have another argument now. I want to know if the Senator means to say that greenbacks are redeemable in coin?

Mr. MCPHERSON. It has been the practice of the Government.

Mr. DANIEL. I know what has been the practice.

Mr. MCPHERSON. As the Senator knows, it has been the practice to redeem them in gold; and it is the practice of the Government now to maintain silver on a standing as good as gold. Therefore it is that silver has been maintained to-day.

Mr. DANIEL. I want to answer the Senator seriatim. In the first place, he has repeated here upon the floor the very legislative practice which I consider as pernicious to truth as some of the practices of the Treasury. He has stated that the greenbacks are redeemable in gold. It is a happy faculty of the monometallists and gold men of this country to state things, as I said before, to suit themselves.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The Senator will permit me—

Mr. DANIEL. Not just now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PADDOCK in the chair). Does the Senator from Virginia yield?

Mr. DANIEL. I will directly. I do not mean any discourtesy.

The greenbacks are payable in silver, and why do you not say they are payable in silver, and that is what has made them valuable? It is because it suits the lingo and the style of monometallists to put gold everywhere foremost; and you are in your very practice of stating the case making one of those discriminations of which the silver men complain. The Senator discloses where this whole trouble comes in. It is the effort to divide this country into two classes and to legislate for class benefit, and not for popular benefit. "It is the practice to pay the creditor in gold." You are much mistaken, sir. It is not the practice of this Government to pay its creditors in gold. It is only the practice of this country to pay one class of its preferred creditors in gold—men who have no more right to gold than any other class; and it is the studied effort of this bill to so rank and range the classes and to so rank and range your silver and gold money as to force what is gold into the pockets of gold men and to let others than bondholders get the scraps from the table. That is the argument.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will allow me a moment, I did not intend to disturb him, but when he says that one class of debt is payable in gold I will have state to him that no portion of the public debt except probably the infinitesimal fraction of 2 per cent. is payable in gold. No discrimination is made in the payment between gold and silver or other forms of money. The bonded debt and the interest on the bonded debt is paid almost exclusively in checks or drafts, and those are paid almost exclusively in some form of paper money, United States notes, silver certificates, and all other forms of paper money.

Therefore the common observation that has been made here within a day or two that the Government pays gold on certain contracts and not on others is an error, because of all the payments made by the Government of the United States 98 per cent. is in drafts and in currency. So of the customs dues that are now paid. The Senator has sent to him every month, I suppose, a statement showing that, of all those customs dues that are paid, less than 2 per cent. are paid in either gold or silver. Silver is used as well as gold, but they are usually paid in ordinary currency, current money, such as you and I and all of us take in payment of our salaries. Gold and silver are not discriminated against therefore by the Government of the United States. They are regarded as the precise equivalent to each other, and their substitutes are used for the payment of almost all transactions of the Government with the people of the United States.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, it is a little curious that our friend, the Senator from New Jersey, should say that it was the practice of the Government to pay the creditors in gold and that the Senator from Ohio should say that it was not. If I mistake not—I have not the document before me now, but I think the Secretary of the Treasury points out in his last report the practice of the Government to pay the creditors in gold, and apprehends as one of the results of too great coinage of silver that he would not be able to do it.

Mr. MCPHERSON. If the Senator will yield to me a moment, I do not think there is very much difference between the statement made by the Senator from Ohio and the one that I have tried to make.

Mr. DANIEL. I have the floor, if you please.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia declines to yield.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I ask the Senator to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Virginia to decline to yield.

Mr. DANIEL. I will take pleasure in yielding as soon as I get through a paragraph. I should like to answer one idea after another, and then I will cheerfully yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Not only does the Secretary of the Treasury advert to this fact in his last report, but I think it has been adverted to in nearly every report of the Secretary of the Treasury, the importance of providing gold to pay the creditor with, the bond creditor, and that the great apprehension of gold leaving the country was that there would not be any gold here to pay him.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall be glad to show the Senator—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield?

Mr. DANIEL. Of course.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have sent for a statement, I think the last one, made only a few days ago, showing the exact modes of payment of all the customs duties, and the other statements I can furnish with a little more time.

Mr. DANIEL. I doubt not that a warrant or check, or something of that sort, always intervenes, but the gold is always saved and hoarded up for the bond creditor, and he is not required to accept in payment a silver dollar or a greenback or anything else but gold. The frequent statement of the Secretary of the Treasury has been entirely in consonance with what the Senator from New Jersey said this morning, that they always wish to have the gold there so the creditor should have the option of taking any sort of money he wanted.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is true, Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me. I think that the United States has always practiced upon that idea, and every bank that is properly conducted practices upon the same idea, that the person who presents a check if he wants gold is allowed to take it. Very few take it. But what I wish to show by the statement I will try to furnish (I think I have one in my committee-room) is that in fact in the payment of all these drafts and warrants upon the Treasury not more than from 2 to 3 per cent. is paid in either silver or gold, about one-fourth less in silver than gold; but nearly all of them are paid in paper money, United States notes, silver certificates, and every form of paper money.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President—

Mr. DANIEL. Just there, if I may finish this idea in one minute, I will show exactly where the present bill so manipulates the silver and its representative as to relegate silver into retirement in the shape of bullion, and so to provide that it would be almost impossible to pay the creditor in anything but gold.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now—

Mr. DANIEL. One moment, if you please.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will allow me a moment, I will give him the statement to which I referred, the official statement, made by the United States Treasury Department, which I now have. I find in 1890 the percentage was 1 per cent. in gold coin, a fractional per cent. in silver coin, 94 per cent. in gold certificates, 2.7 per cent. in silver certificates, and 2.7 per cent. in United States notes.

Mr. TELLER. Are those the import duties?

Mr. SHERMAN. This is a statement showing the monthly receipts from customs in New York, and you find it given there month by month. Sometimes the paper currency payments amount to 17 per cent.; but this extends during a period of two or three years. The Senator will see it the same way. There is a very small fraction of gold and silver paid, but it is paid in gold certificates and silver certificates and United States notes.

Mr. DANIEL. That is a statement of receipts from customs, and not of payments to creditors.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can not give the prepared statements. I could furnish the other statements, but this I happened to remember I had on hand. Those are the payments of customs which in former times were paid exclusively in gold.

Mr. DANIEL. Ninety-four per cent. are paid in gold certificates, I understood the Senator to say.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think so, in one month. You will see the statements are made from month to month.

Mr. DANIEL. While this statement does not exactly corroborate the Senator's statement as to payments to creditors, being a statement of the receipt of customs, it yet, as far as it goes, substantially corroborates my own statement, for 94 per cent. in gold is pretty near all gold.

Mr. SHERMAN. They use gold certificates, as a matter of course.

Mr. DANIEL. When the Senator speaks of using paper he is merely, it seems to me, evading rather than stating the true issue, for it is the paper that represents gold. Ninety-four per cent. of gold certificates are paid. Of course, whether you pay a man in gold or silver or what not you pay him in the form of a check or use some sort of paper as the executive agent of payment, but the medium of payment is on the other side of the paper, and here 94 per cent. of it, if I understand the Senator from Ohio, is gold.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly, because the gold is not used at all. They use the silver certificate, and any form of paper money is now used as legal tender for the payment of all debts, public and private. The Government of the United States, in the payment of bonds, and in paying its interest, or in the receipt of its customs, receives and pays out all forms of paper money, and there is not more than from 1 to 2 per cent. of coin used in the great transactions of the United States. I have sent for another statement which will give the Senator the amount which is used by the national banks.

Mr. DANIEL. However these statements may be differentiated in their details, I state the broad fact, which I am sure the Senator from Ohio and none other can contradict, that the declared policy of this Government through all of its representatives, from the time when he had the honor to be Secretary of the Treasury to the present day, was that we were in some way bound to pay these bond creditors in gold and to provide the gold and not silver to do it. The Senator will remember that, when the debate took place in this body years ago upon the resolution of his colleague from Ohio, Mr. Matthews, that the bonds were payable in coin, although it passed this body, it was resisted to the uttermost upon the ground that the bonds were payable in gold. We all know, as a matter of general public history and universal knowledge, that the whole financial system of this country has been twisted, and shaped, and tortured, and so made as to always bring the gold dollar to pay the bondholder unless he preferred something else.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. DANIEL. Let me go on.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have now the other statement before me to which I referred, if the Senator will allow me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia declines to yield.

Mr. DANIEL. I verify now the statement which I made from recollection a few moments ago, by reading from the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury:

Our bank currency is based upon United States bonds, the principal and interest of which are payable in gold. Our gold certificates are expressly made redeemable in gold coin.

Mr. President, I set the Secretary of the Treasury and the Senator from Ohio to settle their difficulties between them.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now I think I can settle it in about a minute. I will say, to correct the statement made awhile ago by the Senator from Virginia, if he will show me that in any act of mine when Secretary of the Treasury I ever made a discrimination between gold and silver and paper money, I shall be very much obliged to him. But he can not do it. I never did. On the other hand, I have a statement before me "showing the total amount of the classified receipts and disbursements on account of the transfers, revenues, redemptions, and exchanges by Treasury offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886." This is the annual report of the Treasurer of the United States for that year, and it shows the amount of receipts of national-bank notes to have been $37,000,000—I will only give round numbers—United States notes, $366,000,000; gold coin, $84,000,000; gold certificates, $158,000,000; silver certificates, $110,000,000; standard silver dollars, $82,000,000; fractional silver and mixed, $22,000,000; total receipts, $898,000,000.

The disbursements were as follows: National-bank notes, $71,000,000; United States notes, $372,000,000; gold coin, $78,000,000; gold certificates, $118,000,000; silver certificates, $121,000,000; standard silver dollars, $54,000,000; fractional silver and mixed, $25,000,000; total, $842,000,000. Either of these kinds of money or any of them was received and paid out without discrimination, mainly at the convenience of the person who deposited the money or received the money, the silver certificates being several times the amount of the whole gold and silver paid out. So the Senator is mistaken.

When the Secretary of the Treasury speaks about the bonds being payable in gold it means that anybody might ask for gold and receive gold; but in actual fact and practice it is shown by these tabular statements, and all of them are furnished, and by the common knowledge and practice of every one who deals with the Government of the United States, that the great transactions of the Government are in paper money, and that no discrimination whatever is made in the receipts or disbursements of its money. If the Senator has a draft upon the Treasurer here he will usually take it in paper money or it will be paid to him in either form of money he desires.

Mr. DANIEL. Now, will the Senator permit me a moment?

Mr. President, I know the Treasury language generally runs along the line of what the Senator says in a speech which he has just interpolated into mine, but I tested that very thing a few years ago. I was told that there was gold in the Treasury for everybody who wanted it, and so I requested the Sergeant-at-Arms to please bring me my pay in gold. I knew it was held there for the bondholders and that so small a person as a legislative representative of a people was not one of those creditors for whom was provided any special entertainment. So I said to the Sergeant-at-Arms, "I want my pay in gold." He came back and said that there was not any there for that purpose; that greenbacks were legal tender, which I received thankfully.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose the Senator applied to the proper place?

Mr. DANIEL. I only wish to show the fallacy of the statement which the Senator from Ohio is now reiterating, and which has been reiterated year after year, as I conceive, in opposition to the actual state of facts.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me ask the Senator if this demand was made of the Secretary of the Senate?

Mr. DANIEL. I requested the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives to pay me in gold, and he said it was not there.

Mr. SHERMAN. I presume that the Treasurer of the United States did not suppose there was either a Member or Senator who wanted gold, for he would just as lief send the gold to the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House as any other kind of money. He probably did not conceive that anybody there was eager for gold, and therefore did not prepare gold for that particular place.

Mr. DANIEL. I have no doubt he was very much surprised at anybody but a bondholder being so impudent as to ask for gold. I have no doubt he would be surprised at it.

Mr. ALLISON. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. DANIEL. I did not want the gold and was very glad to get the greenbacks; but it shows that you can not always have the option of getting what you want unless the burden is put upon you of going to hunt for it, while it is always provided for the other class of creditors. That is the difference.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. DANIEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. I had occasion not long since to inquire of the Secretary of the Senate what portion of the compensation to Senators and officers of the Senate was paid in gold or silver and what portion in paper money, and I was informed by him that since 1883, with an occasional exception when a Senator desired a small amount of gold for a particular purpose, no Senator had ever requested payment in anything else than paper. Then I supplemented it with the question which seems now uppermost in the mind of the Senator, whether there was any occasion, when gold was required, for a refusal, and he answered me, "No."

Now, I want to say one word to the Senator as my belief. I believe that no public creditor has ever applied to the Treasury of the United States demanding gold but what he has received it, no matter what the nature of the obligation of the Government may have been in that respect, whether for compensation or whether for any debt that the Government was owing to a private citizen or to a creditor.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator does not mean that there was never a time. He does not mean during the war.

Mr. SHERMAN. Since 1879.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not mean, of course, during the war. We all recollect the situation then. I mean practically since the resumption of specie payments in 1879.

If the Senator from Virginia will just allow me one moment more, all our paper money, as I understand, and all the obligations of the Government are redeemed practically in paper money or coin that is equivalent to gold. In other words, everything we have to-day in the shape of paper money is equivalent to gold in every part of the United States, as I understand it; and if any Senator knows that that is not so, I should be glad to be informed where it is that that difference exists.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I return to the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury. The distinguished Senators who have just suggested that there is no discrimination between silver and gold ought to join me in paying especial attention to this peculiar misstatement of the Secretary of the Treasury if they are correct:

Our bank currency is based upon United States bonds, the principal and interest of which are payable in gold.

That is the enunciation fresh from the other end of the Avenue. The Senator from Iowa denies it.

Mr. ALLISON. Oh, no. On the contrary, I say that not only that but every other obligation is practically paid in gold.

Mr. DANIEL. Oh, "practically."

Mr. ALLISON. On demand.

Mr. DANIEL. "Practically?"

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; practically.

Mr. DANIEL. Practically; and practically payable in silver also. Then why does not he say silver and why does he always say gold? It is a part of the lingo of the monometallists. "Practically" you are going to your equations. Why does the Secretary of the Treasury use a plain English term to state a fact in such a way that an honest, truthful man would conceive a different thing from the actuality in existence? Why does he advertise to the civilized world that our bonds are payable, principal and interest, "in gold," when those who are his champions here say they are practically payable in silver? And how is it that this language, which indoctrinates even so intelligent a gentleman as the Senator from New Jersey with the idea that this is a gold-standard nation and publishes to the whole world a different phase from the truth, shall go uncriticized and unchallenged by those who differ with him?

There is a great deal of difference, as I remarked awhile ago, in the way you state a thing. Those who are subtle and astute to deceive can so posture the truth as to make a false impression. Here is the chief financial officer of this nation publishing to Europe, publishing to creditors all over the world, that the principal and interest of our obligations are payable in gold, specifically and solely, without qualification, and without the modification and explanation which the Senator gives when probed for his own interpretation. What sort of way is that to manage the finances of a great nation for the purpose of deceiving the people? I will not say for the purpose, but with the effect to deceive the people, and to deceive all who deal with us, and then to base a claim upon our own self-deception, to go out and say that we told them so, and we allowed our agents to tell them so, and now good faith requires that we should do it.

Now, Mr. President, to come down to the question in this act, the Senator from Ohio challenges any one to show where he ever discriminated between gold and silver and greenbacks.

Mr. SHERMAN. Since January 1, 1879, as a matter of course.

Mr. DANIEL. Since January 1, 1879. Well, I thought the Senator would put a statute of limitations on his declaration.

Mr. SHERMAN. I obeyed the law always; but after that time the law made no discrimination, and therefore I had no right to make any discrimination.

Mr. DANIEL. Did the Senator from Ohio ever state before the Coinage Committee of the House of Representatives that he would never pay out silver unless he could do it at its gold value?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think I ever did. I do not think I ever did pay out silver except at its gold value.

Mr. DANIEL. Did not the Senator state that he never would pay it out except at its gold value?

Mr. SHERMAN. I can not recall what I said. I generally answer for what I did; but I do not know what I said at all times. I may have said to the committee of the House that I would not like to do it, or perhaps that I would not do it if I could help it; but I never paid out silver of any kind except as the equivalent of gold, and I trust the law will never compel me to do so.

Mr. DANIEL. In other words, the Senator from Ohio challenges any one to show where he ever discriminated between the two metals. He now modifies it by a statute of limitations which brings us down to 1879. With my limited information as to the finances of the country I did not suppose that there had been a day between 1879 and 1890 when the Senator from Ohio had not discriminated against silver in favor of gold.

Mr. SHERMAN. I never did at any time since 1879.

Mr. DANIEL. I think his record is completely unbroken from that time to this, and if I lacked that evidence of my assertion which all the financial libraries of this country would furnish until cumulative evidence was piled mountain high, I would want no better evidence than this bill which has just come from his hands, in which he discriminates between silver and gold in a most marked and decisive manner.

Why, Mr. President, these Halls are yet ringing with the tones of the voice of the Senator from Ohio when a week or two ago he discriminated between silver and gold in doing his utmost to prevent the free coinage of silver on a parity with the coinage of gold; and when the Senate with 17 majority treated them both alike, declaring that both should be the unit of value and both freely coined silver fared well until it fell in with the Senator from Ohio again upon its pathway, and here is the result.

I say, Mr. President, and the Senator from Ohio can not say to the contrary, that from the very first line in your statutes which refers to silver and gold to the latest the Senator from Ohio has discriminated against silver and for gold. I will ask him this question. Will you vote to declare that the unit of value shall be both silver and gold, the dollar?

Mr. SHERMAN. Whenever the market value of silver is equal to the market value of gold, then they are equal with each other. As to this pretense about saying silver is discriminated against, why does the Senator discriminate against silver by demanding 16 ounces of silver for 1 ounce of gold?

Mr. DANIEL. That is not a discrimination. That is its fixed status from our anterior coinage.

Mr. SHERMAN. But suppose its market value should fall above or below? Now, what I have always sought to maintain is that the purchasing power of both silver and gold should be always the same. I can see very well how the law can provide in view of the market value being up and down within a certain scale, yet I think the silver dollar ought always to be maintained and held and used and paid out and received as the equivalent of gold coin. If the Senator, notwithstanding the declaration or declamation he so eloquently makes, will just point out where I have discriminated against the law in respect to silver and gold, I should be very glad to hear him, but I think he will find it impossible to do so. As a matter of course, before resumption we discriminated against both silver and gold or in favor of both silver and gold.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, the Senator can always make a good speech, and he never makes a better one than when he is asked a question and takes some collateral subject as his text for answer. There is one maxim of the law which the Senator has well illustrated, "Great is the mystery of judicial interpretation." He has never discriminated against silver, he says, under the law; but then the Senator has always sat with those who could interpret the law, and it has generally been interpreted and carried out in such a way as to result in a discrimination and depreciation of silver.

Now, upon the broad fact that he has not discriminated against silver is that statute which says that the gold dollar shall be the unit of value and is a discrimination against silver. In this very bill, which does not allow a single silver dollar to be coined after a year hence, there is a discrimination against silver. In hoarding silver in the Treasury and not allowing it to circulate either as money or by its paper representative, there is another discrimination against silver. While the Senator says that he wants to make the silver metal the equal in value of the gold metal, a doctrine which is entirely righteous and correct, does not the Senator know that you can not make two things the equal in value unless you impart to those things the same legal attributes, rights, and privileges?

If you hold a quantity of gold in the right hand you can go to the Treasury and you can turn it into gold dollars, no matter what the Secretary wants to do. You may hold any amount of silver in your left hand and there is no man in this country who can get a single dollar of that dollar's worth of it coined into a silver dollar. Is it not a discrimination against the one metal to say, "Gold, go freely and turn yourself into a dollar," and against the other when there is no particle of silver in the United States to-day or anywhere that has a self-assertive right to turn itself into a dollar? While it may do to say that you do not discriminate, how is it possible that the wit or imagination of man can conceive of a greater discrimination?

I shall have to ask the Senator from Ohio what he means by discrimination. I do not know. He has gone off into the region of Treasury interpretation. How the Treasury Department of this country will interpret anything is beyond the conception of any one who either writes or construes the laws which are laid down before it as its guide. What does the Senator from Ohio think of a Secretary of the Treasury who advertises to the world that our bonds, principal and interest, are payable in gold? Where does the Secretary of the Treasury get that idea from? What right has he as a representative of the American people to state that as a fact? Does the Senator from Ohio indorse that statement?

Mr. SHERMAN. I say the bonds are payable in gold or silver, and the silver dollar is just as good as gold, and the Senator is talking about equivalents.

Mr. DANIEL. As the foreman of the jury speaks now, so say we all; but that is an absolute contradiction of what the Secretary of the Treasury has said. I am glad to hear the honorable Senator from Ohio say that.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think the Senator is exactly just to a gentleman who is not present, that is, the Secretary of the Treasury. The remark that our bonds are payable in gold is true. It is equally true to say that the bonds are payable in silver. Either silver dollars or gold dollars can be presented in payment of bonds. So literally it is true either way. Probably if the Secretary had known that his language was going to be commented upon by a very narrow construction, he would have said "silver or gold," because in fact both gold and silver are used exactly at a parity with each other in all the transactions of the Government of the United States. There is no case that I can conceive of now under the laws of the United States, except as to gold certificates, where the silver dollar can not be paid just as well as the gold dollar; and because the Secretary did not put in both gold and silver in that statement I do not think is a very grave crime, and I think the Senator is magnifying a very small matter.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, if that was the only matter, it might be by itself not a great crime, I confess, not a very great one, if it had been done casually; but that offense against the American people has been committed by successive Secretaries of the Treasury, and as the Senator well knows it has created a false public impression. The Senator says it is true that the bonds are payable in gold and it is also true that they are payable in silver. The truth is that they are payable in coin, and so declared; but when the Secretary of the Treasury uses that language here he does not mean that they are payable in either gold or silver.

He is arguing this question for the purpose of showing what is our standard of value, what is our obligation to provide gold to meet the bonds. He goes on to say, quoting from the statute, that "the gold coins of the United States shall be a one-dollar piece, which at the standard weight of 25.8 grains shall be the unit of value." He is using this language in that connection for the purpose of deducing an argument that we are bound to pay gold to our bondholders.

Mr. President, I shall not go further in answering the questions which have been suggested, but confining myself to the text of this bill I proceed to point out now what I conceive to be an objectionable feature.

The 4,500,000 ounces of silver which are to be purchased per month are to be stored away in the Treasury of the United States. Treasury notes of the United States are to be issued in payment for them; "and such Treasury notes shall be a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract."

Now, in respect to the bonded debt of the United States, it is not "otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract," and by the concession made here to-day by the Senator from Ohio, which I was glad to hear, these bonds are not only payable in gold, as stated by the Secretary of the Treasury, but are payable also in silver equally. It is so provided in this bill that neither the 4,500,000 ounces of silver which you put in the Treasury nor that portion of these ounces which are permitted to become money—that not one single dollar can be manufactured out of that enormous bulk of bullion which is to consume the American product, nor can it be so handled under the mechanism of this bill as to be tendered in payment of a public obligation of the United States.

In other words, there is a capacity in this bill of producing $69,660,000 of silver per year. Our American product of silver is something over $50,000,000; but though under this bill you can take and store in the Treasury nearly seventy millions of silver, and not only absorb your own product, but take up the surplus existing product or a portion of the product of other nations, yet out of all that enormous bulk of silver bullion which is to be bought up and put into the Treasury of the United States not so much as one dollar thereof can ever be tendered to a public creditor of the United States in payment of the debt we owe him. Such an enormous discrimination against silver as that has never before existed in our legislation, except when it was completely demonetized, and was almost inconceivable to the wit of men until this bill emanated from the deft hands which prepared it.

Now, sir, I make that assertion in regard to this bill, that not one single dollar of the seventy millions of silver that may be carried to the Treasury under it per year in all these successive years through which that silver stream can flow there—that not one single dollar can ever be taken out of the Treasury under this law to discharge a dollar's worth of the public obligations of the United States. Why do I say this? Because the bonds of the United States are payable in coin, and if this enormous bulk of silver which is to be introduced into our financial system could become coined, then high and low, rich and poor, wage-earner and bondholder, soldier and civilian, would all stand upon the same plane as to silver and would receive a silver dollar as they would receive a gold dollar in discharge of a debt.

But it is also to be remembered that we have declared these bonds of ours to be payable in coin; it has ceased to be regarded as in good faith on the part of this nation to tender a greenback or a Treasury note in payment of them. So when the greenback or Treasury note is emitted and your silver is buried in the vaults of the Treasury, you have by that statute which declares that your bonds shall be payable in coin, and by this statute which declares that not a dollar of your silver product shall be coined, so parted the great bondholding, wealth-possessing people of this country from silver that you imprison the one where it can never escape into the light of a bondholding day, and elevate the other upon a plane of gold where it looks down derisively and turns up its nose at the poor incarcerated silver.

Here, then, while you are making a market for your silver to a certain degree and at a belittled price by giving authority to purchase 4,500,000 ounces a month, you are still depreciating the value of that silver bullion, you are still denying to it the royal right to become money, you are still treating it as a commodity in every way, shape, and form, both in its own material metallic substance and also in the amount of paper which you permit to represent it.

If finance were the mere matter of a day I would give my adhesion to this bill. It is better, in my judgment, that this bill should become a law than that no bill should become a law, and will be better for two, three, or four years to come in this respect, that it will increase the volume of your circulating medium and will to that degree, for a while, relieve to a certain extent the people of the country and do that much good. But this bill is a mere makeshift, it is a mere expedient for the nonce. It is a lawyer's plea put in to get the continuance of a case, and when the witnesses are ready and the jury are about to give a verdict against his client, it is fancied that if you make this experiment with silver and put it there as bullion, and then put out some paper money, you will throw a sop to Cerberus; that you will quiet to some degree the anxieties and respond to the demands of the people for more money. But, Mr. President, there is a day of judgment not far off that will sit upon this bill.

On the one hand it will soon be contended that this had been a mighty effort to restore silver and that it had failed; that paper money was being emitted instead of hard money, and the first administration that could get the power to do it would go to work and contract that currency and draw in the greenbacks, copying the unhappy experience which this nation went through just after our civil war.

Mr. President, I would invoke, on behalf of those true friends of silver coinage who believe in the doctrines which they have preached here, a firm and a steady hand. If they can conceive that the President would veto this bill, I would give that President the opportunity to do it. We do not know that he would or that he would not. We do not know, indeed, but that he may veto this bill. It is not our business to attend to his business. Let him do as he sees fit, according to the manner in which he may read his duty. But if the friends of free coinage here should abandon the field now to accept the substitute, then they are victors who give away more of their spoils than any victors who ever won a field of military or civic strife.

A large majority, as I believe, of the people of this country are behind their backs. You hear it from the wheat and corn fields of the West in tones that can not be mistaken. You hear it from the new Territories of the Union, where enterprise and energy are busy developing new farms and new mines and building up new cities. You hear it in the cotton and tobacco fields of the new South, and you see that even in the commercial centers of this country there are accessions day by day and week by week to those who advocate the doctrine of free silver money.

Many of the most eminent men of this country who live in the great commercial centers, and amongst them the distinguished Edwards Pierrepont, of New York, who was once the minister of our country to the court of St. James, the quiet thinkers who are not immediately engaged in shaving paper and buying bonds, all over this country are swelling and recruiting the silver ranks every day. The distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS], if he represented any other State in this Union but New York, would have wound up the great silver speech which he made upon this floor by a peroration befitting its body in favor of free silver. Well did he say upon one occasion, and the figure of rhetoric was worthy of the fact, that the commerce and credit of the world was a great globe and that gold and silver metals were the Atlas which had to bear that burden.

All of his speeches and essays and doctrines have been in favor of silver. Almost he has been persuaded to give his voice and vote in favor of free silver. And with the voice of the people of this country at the back of the silver men North, South, East, and West, we stand up in this Congress noting every year of our experience such great accessions to our ranks that he must read the future with short-sighted eyes who can not see that victory is in the air and soon will be registered if those who carry its banners cling to them firmly at the pitch of the game.

Who would have thought ten or twelve or fifteen years ago that the Senate of the United States by seventeen majority could declare for free silver? It has been done, and it is the greatest intellectual triumph of a theory of finance which in my judgment has ever been witnessed in the world's history. Why, sir, but a few years ago when silver was introduced upon this floor it was scorned and derided. The man who dared to advocate the free silver dollar was called a lunatic. But now from all parts of this country so has that question been developed in argument and by experience, and so has it entered into the minds of men, that seventeen majority in this body has registered its decree in favor of it.

I am told that it is not decorous to speak of what is going on in the other side of the Capitol. I will therefore give my remarks upon that subject no personality or location, but simply refer in general terms to the fact that the breeze is blowing silverward wherever you come in contact in this country with the people or their Representatives.

Sooner or later Congress and the Executive have got to come in collision on this subject. Either in the next Presidential campaign somebody has got to be elected President of the United States who will stand up boldly and fearlessly for the money of the people and will not conceive that the sun rises and sets within the purlieus of banking houses in great cities; or sooner or later Congress and the Executive have got to come in collision on this subject. If this collision has got to come, why not let it come now?

There is no man who loves peace of all kinds more than I love it. I hate quarreling and I hate fighting; but if I have got to fight and must quarrel, here and now is the place where I always like to have it out. If a Democratic President was in the White House and was against silver, I should like to have the opportunity, as far as lies within my humble resources, to teach him a little true Democracy.

I am tired, heartily tired, of seeing the people of this country thwarted at every turn they take for greater freedom in the management of their finances. We have not had a representative man of the full free thought of the American people in the White House for so these many years; and as long as parties are so shaped and opinions are so warped by old issues and old quarrels that the mind of this country can not have fair play, we are not going to have any. You put a gold man on a silver platform and he will welcome the committee and will say that he indorses it every line and stands on every plank; but if he is elected President then comes in the interpretation. [Laughter.] Good Lord, deliver us from the interpreters and the interpretation! "Silver as money" was the Republican platform; silver as a prison commodity is the practice.

Mr. MITCHELL. While the Senator is on the subject of interpretation, let me ask why did the Democratic party put nothing in their platform respecting silver? [Laughter.]

Mr. DANIEL. The Democratic party at the last convention was in the same hole that the Senator from Oregon is now. [Laughter.] I would have expected his sympathy. He has only emphasized his own unhappy condition. He has his whole body in the hole, and if I had been in his place I would not have poked my head out to point people to my unfortunate condition. [Laughter.]

So far as silver was concerned we had the elephant when the Democratic convention met at Chicago, and so far as silver is concerned you, gentlemen, have the elephant now. The elephant trod on silver in 1888 and he is treading on it now.

Mr. ALDRICH. Do you mean President Cleveland?

Mr. DANIEL. Yes, sir; of course I mean President Cleveland. [Laughter.] But there was just a little more independence amongst the Democrats than I see now—

Mr. ALDRICH. How will it be in 1892?

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, the prophecies upon gold and silver, as I read them in the record, are such as to warrant me in saying that a prophet is seldom without honor save in his own country. I can not venture to say anything about what will happen in 1892. I can not tell here what will happen in a week [laughter], and sometimes we are very much disappointed in what happens in a night. A prophet can only shoot at very short range in political affairs. But one thing I think I may venture to say; it is a mere belief, scarcely a prophecy; and that is, that in 1892 somebody will have to talk silver remarkably well or he will not be elected. What he may do afterwards no prophet can venture to say.

Observance of political platforms is not a virtue which has been remarkable in any of our public servants in recent times, and the political platform has come to be almost a useless piece of political furniture. The people a little later, I think, will look more at the man and his record than at his declarations. When the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] can announce as his platform that he never has discriminated against silver and can now appear in the front ranks of the so-called silver men, there are obvious divergencies between the common acceptance of history and records and platforms which are as irreconcilable as the terms of this bill with its professions.

I am reminded in looking at this bill of what Macaulay remarked on one occasion about compromises. He observed that compromises are very illogical and seldom satisfactory, and as an illustration he observed that if two gentlemen of good character were to get into a dispute, and one were to insist that two and two made four, and the other that two and two made six, and were to submit the question to the arbitrament of mutual friends, the inevitable verdict rendered by the arbitrators would be about this: That having considered all the peculiar circumstances in this case, and while there was much in favor of the proposition of the one gentleman that two and two made four, and they could well understand how the other had derived a conviction that two and two made six, yet under the peculiar circumstances of the case they reached the conclusion that two and two made five. [Laughter.]

Arbitrators always divide and in all arbitrations in which men who think in opposite directions are trying to get upon the same platform an inevitable result is a heterogeneous and unsatisfactory product. When the Senator from Ohio, a believer in the single gold standard, a fighter against silver for a quarter of a century, a prophet who declared that $50,000,000 of silver would deluge and ruin the country, and the honorable Senator from Nevada, who believes that the very atmosphere of the world would be improved by a little silver ingredient in it—when these two gentlemen pool their issues and the Senate is given the composite results, you will find that in every section of the bill two and two make five. [Laughter.]

The theory upon which our worthy silver friends have acted is that in order to restore silver to its parity with gold you have to give it the same functions and attributes which you attach to gold. I have read their speeches, and I have got so indoctrinated with their philosophy that I can no longer recognize it in this legislative expression, and I can not educate it out of me upon such short notice.

Now, gentlemen, if you will stand up to this fight you can win it, and if you run away from it you will lose it. A man is always going to stand up to the thing that he loves most. Whenever there be two men in the field and one is to be taken and the other left, you will always stand by the one you love most and let the other one that you do not like most be left. If you believe in the free coinage of silver, as you have induced the people of this country to believe—and I am one of your humble disciples—if it has all the good in it that you have said it had, if the degradation of it has the evil in it which you have said it had, if you love that principle of finance more than you do a little short, evanescent political adjustment of difficulties which in their nature are irreconcilable, you will stand by free silver and let the President of the United States take care of himself.

Mr. President, I am so devoted to the Democratic party that it seems almost a sacrilege to my heart when I think of anything that could make me part company with it. It has passed from my mind to my heart, into the region of affection, because it was my friend and my people's friend when friends were few and much wanted. But as much as I love that party, as deeply as I am attached to it by the traditions of its history and my own, I had almost rather see a Republican President of this country with a financial system which would come to the relief of our whole people than to see a Democratic President treading out and crushing down as our Presidents have done those great aspirations of the American heart which have asked for a freer atmosphere and for fuller play to their energies and their hopes and their enterprises and their ambition.

I believe that the two old parties are enough for this country, for when you come to build up new political organizations you are putting out upon an unknown sea. But it would be better to have a new political party in this country than to have both of these old ones perpetually cringing—I perhaps ought not to use a term that might seem offensive, for offense I do not intend—but the two old political parties perpetually bowing and giving up their opinions and the opinions of the people whom they represent to those who, for the nonce, are in the Presidential chair.

Sir, there is a danger to republican institutions of this country lurking in the too great deference of Congress to Executive thought and action. While this Republic is scarce yet a hundred years old, there is no one who has studied the course of public opinion and has witnessed how it is perpetually foiled and set aside by the mechanism of legislation and Executive administration, who has not been convinced that in this country it is more difficult for public opinion to find its expression in legislative action than in almost any of the enlightened civilizations of the world.

In France with her Corps Législatif, in England with her Parliament, when the great body of those people have solemnly and deliberately made up their minds upon any public question, there is no cabinet, there is no crowned head or chief executive, there is no premier, there is no power, that can possibly resist that enlightened public judgment. But if you have a coterie of sharp, astute men in this country who are attached to either one of the political organizations and who possess elements, in a degree, of popularity and power, and if perchance the idea gets embedded in their brain that they are wiser than their day and generation, and that it is their duty to indoctrinate the organizations which have made them their heads and spokesmen with different views and different notions from those which have welled up from the great depths of the popular heart, such is the mechanism of our Government and so do its balances of power play against that volume of public sentiment that it is almost next to an impossibility to get the will of the people registered upon the statute-books and carried into a law.

Four or five years ago, when the President-elect of the United States, Mr. Cleveland, sent to Congress his message about silver, which had been preceded by his letter urging cessation from its coinage, if this had been in reality, as it is in theory, a representative government, his Cabinet would have resigned in a little while after his Administration came in. That great Democratic voice which was ready to burst forth in its legitimate expression would have recorded itself then as it is trying to record itself now, in favor of a freer and more liberal treatment of our silver money.

Mr. President, if you wish political badinage, if you propose to treat this subject as we might do upon the stump when you attack one speaker by showing that he is bad and you think you cover the whole case when you show he is worse, we might have "tit for tat" between our political opponents and ourselves, and at the end of the battle both of us would be worsted. But if there is to be a concession here, a reasonable concession ought always to be to a certain degree in order, but it ought not to be until you have exhausted your forces and until you have thrown the responsibility exactly where it belongs. Refuse this conference report, ask for a new conference, get this bill passed if you can, and send it to the President; if he vetoes it try to pass it over his veto. Why should you hesitate to give him an opportunity to veto it?

If I were President of the United States I should like to have the opportunity to veto a bill which I thought was wrong and injurious to the people. The popular mind attaches great dignity to the office of President. If this bill ought to be vetoed and he should veto it, he would be in a commanding position before the American people. He would say, "I was urged to do this thing, I thought it was wrong, and I vetoed it." You are not putting him into any bad position by giving him an opportunity to express his view and his conviction upon this subject. You would be putting him in the position which a wise and a brave man would crave the possession of.

If he has the courage to veto it, he would rejoice in the opportunity to exhibit that courage. If he has the wisdom to say that you are wrong and that the gold monopolists are right, he ought to rejoice in the opportunity of pointing out the errors of your ways and turning you into the right path. Therefore you can have no just, sensible, stable political motive for trying to adjust this issue between irreconcilable doctrines. Sooner or later it has got to be fought out. The people are not going to be content with a makeshift, an expedient. It postpones to the next session a battle which can be fought out here at this session.

Free coinage, if it is destroyed to-day, will come in to-morrow. You have gained nothing in putting this question off from one Congress to another. Four years ago it was almost ripe for action. It was postponed. It came up the next year, and then again and again and again, and now it is here, and it is on the very edge of victory if the leaders in the battle will stand up to those who have followed them. I do not feel, neither shall I speak towards any of them with any sense of bitter reproach. I appreciate their difficulties and I think I understand their feelings. It is natural to them, it is proper that they should desire to compromise, if compromise will effect the result. That is always the disposition of a just man. But it does seem to me that they have given away too much in this compromise and they have received too little. There can be but little inflation of our currency, even if this bill be carried out with good will and with a disposition to advance it to all intents and purposes.

If you will read the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury you will see the statement of the retirement of the national-bank notes. In this very year, 1889, with all your coinage of silver, counting the twelve months back there has been, if I may rely upon the reports that I see in the newspapers, a net contraction of the currency of the people of the United States. However that particular fact may be, in the last six years there has been an actual average contraction of your national-bank currency of $30,000,000 per annum or $2,500,000 per month. You have inflated your currency scarcely a dollar with all the silver that you are coining under the Bland act. A silver dollar has merely taken the place of another or paper dollar which was going out of circulation just as it came in.

If you were to give the most liberal scope and play to this measure, with its continuous and perhaps increasing retirement of your national-bank circulation, it is almost doubtful whether you will have any increase of your circulating medium, and certainly you will have but a very moderate increase when you contrast the demands of this great and growing and prosperous country with the financial resources which they rely upon.

Now, Mr. President, in conclusion, if I had the honor to occupy a position amongst the true friends of free silver that could give to my voice or advice any force or weight, I would say to them this: I do not seek extreme measures or factious opposition to any of the powers of our Government; but we represent here a great idea of the American people which has shown its dignity, its force, by an almost unexampled majority in this great body.

There is not a thing disrespectful to our colleagues in the other House of Congress; there is nothing inconsiderate to our colleagues here in saying to them in respectful terms: "We can not consent to this compromise; we will ask another conference; we will ask you to reconsider this upon the lines which we have presented in the Senate bill; we will do our duty to the uttermost to advocate and to enforce the idea which we believe to be best and most judicious for this nation; we will let responsibility go to whosoever may assume to take it, and if we be beaten after we have fought our battle game to the finish, then, and only then, will it be for us to consider the policy next to be pursued."

For two or three years, for a little while, this will in some degree please the people by the declaration that they have more money and by actually giving it to them, but silver is not going to rise to par under this bill. New difficulties are going to beset and thicken upon our pathway. In the mean time it will be contended, just as we see the gold men undertaking to contend here now, in the face of law, in the face of precedent, in the face of the plain truth, that we have adopted the single standard.

The Secretary of the Treasury, instead of correcting his ill-conceived and misused language, will go along and declare again that our bonds are payable in gold. The world will be deceived by our action. The mystery of interpretation will evolve out of the smoke and cloud of this statute ideas not contained in it. The New York papers and the financiers of the world will so iterate and reiterate their views of it; it will be twisted and tortured and turned in this direction and that; and meantime silver will be degraded as a mere commodity to be warehoused, not a dollar of it being coined, not one dollar of it more being sent out in its paper representative according to its dollar capacity.

Have our friends upon the other side, who stand here for the silver dollar, thought about that? Do they know the doctrine they are committing their votes to when they say, "We support this measure?" Not only are they submitting to the degradation of silver in its own proper substantial metal form, but they are submitting to its degradation in the documentary evidence which shall go forth to the world to represent it.

You do not permit that silver to be coined into as many dollars as it would make at the fixed ratio of 15.98 to 1, but the paper dollar which you sent forth as a silver representative is represented by only so many silver dollars in bullion as was the cost of that bullion. What this oracular language means in this bill when it refers to a ratio of silver I do not know, but there is a beckoning hand for an interpreter in this clause of this new measure:

It being the established policy of the United States to maintain the two metals on a parity with each other upon the present legal ratio or such ratio as may be provided by law.

In other words, there is an established policy with reference to some unknown and unstated ratio. It is very difficult to establish a policy with reference to an unknown quantity. A straight line is said to be the shortest way between two points, but you can not locate the line until you first locate the points. How can you establish a policy about a ratio which is unexpressed and which, so far as this committee is concerned, is inexpressible? That ratio, which may be provided by law, it may be, is a larger ratio of silver in the silver dollar; and if we are to divine the thoughts of men from the mechanical structure of the statute which has come forth from their minds it would seem to be indicated by the structure of this statute, not that its projectors had their faces turned to the French ratio, but rather that they had their faces turned to some ratio that would put more silver, and not less, in the dollar.

Why? Because the paper representative of your silver bullion does not go forth into the world to represent as many dollars as that bullion could be manufactured into; and, as you are hoarding up in your Treasury a bulk of bullion in ounces not to be imparted dollarhood in paper or coin, the circumstantial evidence, if you were to look only to the body of the act, would lead to the deduction that you were keeping that in order to put more silver into your dollars at such a time as it might please you to coin those dollars.

Therefore this bill, with all the speculations and conjectures and diverse interpretations which are already put upon it (and many more may be evolved out of it), is not the solution of a question which ought to find its solution at this session of Congress; and while I am reluctant to vote against any measure which puts more money in circulation, and while, if I had fought this battle to its last expression, I am candid enough to say and to admit that I should rather have this bill, with all its objectionable features, than none, I can not bring my mind to assent to so awkward and incongruous a resolvent of a proposition which should be scientifically and justly treated instead of jumbled up with inconsistent provisions.

Mr. CAMERON. May I ask the Senator if he has finished?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. DANIEL. I will let the Senator know. I have not quite finished.

Mr. CAMERON. I did not know whether the Senator had finished or not. If he has, I should like to have the vote taken on this question now.

Mr. DANIEL. I am sorry I can not accommodate the Senator. I am nearly through, though. I shall be through in a moment. I might have answered the Senator that I had finished, but I was not quite through.

Mr. CAMERON. I thought the Senator had finished.

Mr. DANIEL. I had about finished, but I am not quite through. I shall be through in a moment.

Concluding my observations, while I dislike to vote against any bill which would produce more money even for the time, I shall feel obliged to vote against this one unless those gentlemen who have been the advocates of free silver will first carry their logic to its ultimate conclusion and pursue it to the last ditch. When we get there, I shall be glad to do whatever may seem to be best under the circumstances; but we are not there yet, unless by their action.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I desire to take the floor on this bill, but I shall not be able to conclude my remarks this evening.

Mr. VEST. I ask the Senator if he will yield for a motion to adjourn.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3538) for the relief of Albert H. Emery.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 152) providing for the printing of eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late James Laird was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

ALBERT H. EMERY.

Mr. SPOONER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3538) for the relief of Albert H. Emery, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the words "one hundred and twenty-five" and insert in lieu thereof the words "seventy-five;" and that the Senate agree to the same.

JOHN C. SPOONER,

E. K. WILSON,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

M. M. BOOTHMAN,

JOHN M. FARQUHAR,

Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

TREASURY NOTES—SILVER BULLION.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the motion of the Senator from Missouri is pressed, with the leave of the Senator, I should like to know whether an hour can be fixed to-morrow for a vote on this report. This is the third day consumed in the consideration of the report of the committee of conference, and at this time of the session I think we ought to go on now and conclude it or else agree upon an hour to-morrow when we shall take the vote. Senators have the matter in their own hands. Practically they have occupied two or three days in discussing the conference report. I think Senators on this side of the Chamber, at least, are agreed that we ought to have a vote on the adoption of the report as soon as possible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Ohio to submit any proposition?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will submit the proposition that at 2 o'clock to-morrow we shall take the vote.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senate is very thin now. I only know of two or three Senators who desire to submit remarks upon the conference report, and just as soon as they have finished the vote can be taken. I see no occasion for any agreement about the matter. An agreement will not hasten final action upon the report. There will be no opposition, except in the way of legitimate discussion of it.

Mr. CULLOM. You agree to vote to-morrow, do you not?

Mr. COCKRELL. No; but I have no doubt we shall be able to take the vote to-morrow and before this time in the evening; but there is no occasion for making a formal agreement to that effect.

Mr. CAMERON. Do you agree to an hour to-morrow?

Mr. COCKRELL. I think we shall doubtless vote to-morrow, but we can not fix an hour now when the vote shall be taken.

Mr. CAMERON. Why not agree to fix an hour now?

Mr. SHERMAN. Unless we can make some agreement about taking the vote to-morrow I feel disposed to insist upon a ye-and-nay vote on the question of adjournment, because I do not think we ought to consume so much time upon a conference report; I have rarely known such a report to occupy more than a day. I admit that this is an important subject, yet the questions involved in it are few and simple, and I do not wish to prevent any one from discussing them; but if Senators will name an hour to-morrow when the vote can be taken, I have no doubt we can agree to it. There are many other matters pressing behind this. I think Senators on the other side might consent to set an hour to-morrow for the final vote.

Mr. COCKRELL. There will be no opposition to taking the vote as soon as the speeches are concluded, and they will not be any longer than there is occasion for. Let the Senator give notice that he will expect the Senate to dispose of the conference report to-morrow, and that notice will be enough.

Mr. SHERMAN. I give notice that to-morrow we shall try to sit this out even if we have to sit all night. I think it would not be exactly fair to insist upon the vote to-day, because notice to that effect has not been given.

Mr. VEST. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. MORGAN. I yield.

Mr. VEST. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri that the Senate do now adjourn.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 21, noes 26.

Mr. HOAR. Before the Chair declares the result of the vote I ask unanimous consent to say that I forgot a pair which I have with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], which I think I ought to observe on this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Did the Senator vote in the negative?
Mr. HOAR. I voted in the negative.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then there are 21 votes in the affirmative and 25 in the negative. The Senate refuses to adjourn.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TELLER. It is not in order, of course, to discuss this?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate can only proceed by unanimous consent. Is there objection to the Senator proceeding? The Chair hears none.

Mr. TELLER. What is the purpose, when it is understood that we are not to sit this out to-night, here at fifteen minutes to 6 o'clock to insist upon a Senator commencing his speech? We gain nothing by this. There will be time enough to-morrow, it seems to me, if it should then appear that there is any attempt to postpone this question improperly, to sit it out, but I do not think we should force Senators to go on at this time of night. For one, I am ready to adjourn.

Mr. COCKRELL. It must be perfectly manifest to the Senate that this measure will not be disposed of to-night.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is debate in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I object to debate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think the measure will be disposed of to-night.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont objects to debate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have not a bit of doubt that we shall dispose of it to-morrow, but I will not make any agreement about it. There is no occasion for any agreement. There will be no unnecessary delay in the discussion of this question, and I have not a particle of doubt that it will be disposed of to-morrow. Nobody wants to delay action upon it improperly or unnecessarily; but it will not be disposed of to-night.

Mr. SHERMAN. So far as my vote is concerned, I never like to take snap judgment, and with the assurance that has been given now by the Senator from Missouri, that this matter shall be closed to-morrow, so far as I am concerned I am willing to vote for an adjournment now. I do not want to compel the gentleman from Alabama to make a speech at this hour, but I shall insist, so far as I can to-morrow, that we sit this measure out and close it, although I think it ought to have been disposed of to-day.

Mr. CULLOM. The call for the yeas and nays had better be withdrawn.

Mr. TELLER. Let the call be withdrawn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the withdrawal of the demand for the yeas and nays? ["None."] The Chair hears none.

The Chair will again submit the question: The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (5 o'clock and 44 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, July 10, 1890, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 9, 1890.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Journal will be considered as approved.

RETURN OF A SENATE BILL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following request of the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, July 7, 1890.

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 3751) to grant to the Mobile and Dauphin Island Railroad and Harbor Company a right to trestle across the shoal water between Cedar Point and Dauphin Island.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request of the Senate will be complied with. [A pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

THE LATE JAMES LAIRD.

Mr. STIVERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of a privileged report. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to present the following report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 152) providing for the printing of eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late James Laird.

Resolved, etc., That there be printed of the eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late James Laird, a Representative from Nebraska, 6,000 copies; of which 2,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 4,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives. That the clerk of printing records be authorized to compile and index the eulogies and to write a biographical introduction for the same, and that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to have printed a portrait of James Laird to accompany said eulogies, and for the purpose of engraving and printing and preparing said portrait and work the sum of $3,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The report (by Mr. STIVERS) is as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 152) providing for the printing of the eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late James Laird, have considered the same and report it back with the recommendation that it do lie upon the table, and that the following joint resolution be adopted as a substitute therefor:

"A joint resolution (H. Res. 183) providing for the printing of eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late James Laird.

"Resolved, etc., That there be printed of the eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late James Laird, a Representative from Nebraska, 6,000 copies; of which 2,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 4,000 copies shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, and that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to have printed a portrait of the said James Laird to accompany said eulogies, and for the purpose of engraving and printing said portrait the sum of $500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. That of the quota to the House of Representatives the Public Printer shall set apart 50 copies, which he shall have bound in full morocco with gilt edges, the same to be delivered, when completed, to the family of the deceased."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the substitute.

The substitute was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that as this resolution departs from the usual custom in cases of this kind it may be proper that a word of explanation be offered. The resolution provides for a much smaller number than the resolutions have usually provided in cases of eulogies, but the successor of Mr. Laird in this House [Mr. LAWS] has had his attention called to the fact, and he stated that that was satisfactory to him, therefore the committee reported the smaller number.

The substitute was then passed.

Mr. STIVERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the substitute was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ALBERT H. EMERY.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 3538) for the relief of Albert H. Emery.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the adoption of the report.

Mr. BYNUM. I desire to be heard on that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I—

Mr. BYNUM. The "gentleman from Indiana" addressed the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York had signified that he desired to move the previous question.

Mr. BYNUM. He did not say so. The gentleman was entitled to the floor, but surrendered it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York did not surrender it except for a vote. He has a right not to take up time if he sees fit; but he has the right to be recognized to make his motion.

Mr. BYNUM. But if he surrendered the floor for one purpose he surrenders it for everything. Therefore, he has not the right to—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York did not surrender the floor; but if it was not necessary to move the previous question he would not do so.

Mr. BYNUM. He did surrender the floor.

Mr. FARQUHAR. The gentleman from Indiana is somewhat previous. The gentleman from New York had no intention to surrender the floor. Knowing his own rights in bringing up this report, he had no idea of surrendering them. Now I move the previous question on the adoption of the report of the conference committee.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will there be any debate on that?

The SPEAKER. There will be twenty minutes' debate on a side after the previous question is ordered.

The question was put; and the Speaker announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 91, noes 78.

Mr. BYNUM. Tellers.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 108, nays 67, not voting 153; as follows:

Mr. GREENHALGE with Mr. WHITING.

Mr. WHEELER, of Michigan, with Mr. LANE.

Also the following for the rest of this day:

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois, with Mr. GOODNIGHT.

Mr. GIFFORD with Mr. DIBBLE.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. KENNEDY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 8245) to provide for the disposal of the abandoned military reservations in Wyoming Territory.

A bill (H. R. 9104) granting to the Jacksonville, St. Augustine and Halifax River Railway Company a right of way across the United States military reservation at St. Augustine, Fla.

The Clerk proceeded to recapitulate the names of members voting.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the names be dispensed with.

Mr. BYNUM. I object.

The Clerk completed the recapitulation.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. Twenty minutes on either side are allowed for debate.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to occupy the attention of the House for only a few minutes in connection with this conference report. This Emery claim has been before both Houses of Congress for the past ten years. At each session since 1880 bills have been inroduced appropriating $200,000 to settle the claim, and those bills have met with varied success in the Senate and in the House. Seeing that the amount now called for by the conference report is only $75,000, I desire, for the information of the House, to recapitulate, as far as my knowledge goes, the previous action of Congress upon this subject. The first bill was introduced for the payment of Mr. Emery in the Forty-sixth Congress, in April, 1880. The amount named in the bill was $200,000. That bill was not reached on the Calendar in that Congress. In the Forty-seventh Congress the Senate passed a bill appropriating $225,000.

In the House a bill appropriating $200,000 was reported and placed on the Calendar, but it was not reached. In the Forty-eighth Congress the Senate passed a bill appropriating $200,000, and in the House a bill was reported appropriating $100,000, but it was not reached on the Calendar. In the Forty-ninth Congress a bill appropriating $200,000 passed the Senate, and in the House a bill was passed appropriating $63,151.62. In the conference between the two bodies in the Forty-ninth Congress, as many gentlemen will remember, a compromise was reached, fixing the amount at $100,000, Mr. Trigg, a Democratic member of the House, being the leader in the conference at that time. That bill went to the President and was neither signed nor vetoed. In the Fiftieth Congress the Senate again reported and passed a bill for $200,000 which was not reached on the Calendar, and in the House a bill appropriating $150,000 was reported, but was not reached for consideration. In this Congress, as we all know, the Senate bill was for $200,000, and the bill reported from the House committee was for $75,000.

The later proceedings in respect to this matter have been in the committee of conference. The conferees met and the Senate agreed to pass the bill at $125,000, but the vote of the House was for $50,000. It may seem somewhat anomalous that three members of this House, appointed as conferees on this claim, should come back from a second conference recommending an appropriation of $75,000, the same amount that they reported on the first conference; but the reasons, I think, are very plainly set forth, and they consist in large part of transcripts from the previous proceedings of this House upon this subject. As a member of that conference committee, I want to say that it was my own judgment that fairness and justice toward this man required that the amount should be $125,000, and I was ready to favor that amount. When we met in conference, as is customary among conferees, as every gentleman here well knows, we took what we thought was the consensus of opinion at the time the vote was had in the House fixing the amount at $50,000.

We considered that at that time some gentlemen were of opinion that the amount was not sufficient, and bearing that fact in mind, remembering that this claim had been ten years before Congress, had been sifted and attacked by ridicule and otherwise, and had been brought down from the original amount of $200,000, and from the amount of $100,000, which the Forty-ninth Congress had agreed upon, to $75,000, and remembering, also, that there certainly was no new evidence in the case to show fraud or any lack of self-sustaining power in the claim—bearing in mind all these considerations, we felt that there was nothing in the present attitude of the case to justify any conferee in going below $75,000, the amount here proposed. For these reasons I, with the other conferees on the part of the House, agreed to report the amount at $75,000, and, after much higgling on the part of the Senate, their conferees agreed to come down to that sum. Now, if there is any criticism to be made upon the House conferees for coming back with the same amount of money that they came with before, I am satisfied that any of the House conferees can fully explain the action of the committee, and show that in fairness and justice to this claimant we could not have brought in a report for a less amount.

I have no desire to discuss the merits of this matter at length, because it has been thoroughly discussed for at least four Congresses, but I want to call attention to one point which came before the conferees. In Executive Document No. 74, Forty-sixth Congress, will be found a statement of this case. At that time the committee examined and sifted every paper offered in evidence and vouchers were produced, vouchers sworn to, and some of them under seal, by which Mr. Emery established such a claim as could be established in any court of the United States, for $103,949.37. In that amount, however, was included $21,801.55 of salary. In our conference we discussed that, and we all agreed that as this salary item had been the chief bone of contention in the debate we would drop it out, and then there was remaining a sum of $82,142.82, which I, as a Representative upon this floor, claiming the common honesty of a man and a citizen, believe Mr. Emery can show by vouchers that he is clearly entitled to, and I vindicate my signature to this conference report by reference to those figures. I feel that upon these papers alone I can vindicate my signature to this report.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. FARQUHAR. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. If Mr. Emery could only show vouchers for a little over $82,000, why is it that, as the gentleman says, bills have been passed in previous Congresses allowing him all the way from $100,000 to $200,000?

Mr. FARQUHAR. I will explain. There were two patents involved, one of which was certainly worth over $50,000; and the United States, when they got this machine, took both the patents that belonged to Mr. Emery, who before that time could have sold his patents to a syndicate for five times that amount, as appears in Executive Document No. 74.

Mr. TILLMAN. What were those patents for? Were they for a hydraulic press and hydraulic weighing-machine?

Mr. FARQUHAR. My friend from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] and I have discussed this question before.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have ransacked the Patent Office, and I know all about it.

Mr. FARQUHAR. That may be so.

Mr. TILLMAN. I asked what those patents were for.

Mr. FARQUHAR. The members of the commission themselves knew the worth of those patents, and never supposed when Mr. Emery was to build this machine that there was to be any surrender of his private property in those patents. What was wanted was a machine for $31,500 with no surrender of the patents. No one ever thought the United States would appropriate the product of this man's brain extending over twenty years and give it to the public. It was in view of these circumstances that a sense of justice dictated the putting of $200,000 in some of these bills.

Mr. HOPKINS. If that amount was dictated by a sense of justice how is it that we have reports for less amounts? If Mr. Emery is entitled, as you claim, to $200,000, why do you not insist on doing him full justice?

Mr. FARQUHAR. Let me tell the gentleman from Illinois that I am dealing with this question upon a conference report, and I can not allow myself to be controlled by any action heretofore.

Mr. HOPKINS. Is it not the fact that during the ten years this claim has been pending before Congress no two reports have fixed a like amount?

Mr. FARQUHAR. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. They have all been different.

Mr. FARQUHAR. And the gentleman may take any claim against the United States pending for years in Congress, and no two reports will agree.

Mr. HOPKINS. I do not concur with the gentleman in that. If Mr. Emery has a just claim, which can be figured up in dollars and cents, there is no reason why the amount should be different every time the claim comes before the House.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Does the gentleman from Illinois take any exception to the vouchers in this case?

Mr. HOPKINS. I take exception to the entire claim. I hold that it is an unjust claim from beginning to end.

Mr. BUCHANAN, of New Jersey. Did the gentleman ever know two juries to fix precisely the same amount of damages in the same case?

Mr. FARQUHAR. Never unless they were acting under some kind of "civil service rules" that I do not understand.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. And did any gentleman ever know Congress to pay a just claim against the Government in full? [Laughter.] I never heard of such a case.

Mr. HOPKINS. Well, Mr. Speaker, because the Government has not done justice to some other parties, that is no reason why an improper and unjust claim should be allowed.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I grant that.

Mr. CUTCHEON. If this claim is unjust and without foundation, how does it happen that five different committees of this House have reported upon it favorably?

Mr. HOPKINS. In every instance there has been a division of opinion in the committee, one portion of the committee holding the claim to be unjust and without proper foundation.

Mr. CUTCHEON. In no single instance has any committee that examined the claim failed to report upon it favorably; and no committee has reported in favor of paying less than $100,000.

Mr. HOPKINS. But there has been a minority report in every case.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] whatever time he may desire.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I will reserve my time for the present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan). Ten minutes have been occupied on that side. The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] as controlling the time on the other side.

Mr. BYNUM. I think the time which has been taken up in answering these questions should be deducted from the time on the other side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has been.

Mr. BYNUM. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that members fully understand from the reading of the apology filed by the committee the amount of this donation. [Laughter.] A great many members, especially on this side of the Chamber, do not fully understand what there is in this claim that gives it such a preference over other claims against this Government which have been favorably reported upon time and again by the appropriate committees. I have heard it said that it is easier to get through this House a claim for a large amount than one for a small sum; and the history of this claim in this House corroborates that statement. There seems to be an unusual eagerness on the part of several members of this body to give this claim every advantage that it can have when it comes before the House. At the same time there are hundreds of just claims for $100, $200, $300, and other small amounts, in favor of claimants who really need the money, who are not able to come here and lobby for their claims; yet all these small claims, favorably reported after a full investigation of all the evidence in the cases, are and have been denied any consideration in this House, although more than seven months of this session have elapsed.

Why is it, Mr. Speaker? I say that until this Government shall have paid its just debts, its honest, valid obligations, it ought not to engage in the business of donations of this character; and until then I shall oppose the passage of any bill embodying such features as this bill embodies. There is no reason why these other bills should be crowded out and have no consideration whatever given to them.

What is there in this bill, unless it be the amount it carries, that enlists the support of the members of this House, the friendship of the Speaker, and the majority of the House, to rush it through here while at the same time denying, as this House has done for more than seven months, the consideration of these small claims that the Government justly owes and which ought to have been paid long ago?

Now, I am as much in favor of true economy as any one, but I do not want to see the honor of this Government sacrificed, or just and honest claims defeated by denying them consideration, under the pretense of economy. The Government is able to pay its just debts, and it ought to pay them, and until they are paid the members of this body should not come here and vote a donation of $75,000 on a claim of this character, the friends of which have been forced to admit on the floor of the House, in the discussion of the merits of the case, that there was not a shadow of obligation on the part of the Government to pay it.

I reserve any portion of the time yet remaining to me.

Mr. BYNUM. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, as I have already spoken twice on this bill during the present session of Congress, I would not have said anything at this time if the conference report published in the RECORD of this morning had not asserted as a fact that I had promised not to oppose the bill if reported for $75,000, as agreed upon in conference. Sir, I assert that I never made any such promise.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Why is that statement in the RECORD and without correction?

Mr. TILLMAN. It is printed in the RECORD, but it is not true.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I simply took it from the RECORD, and the gentleman has never denied it.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is not a fact. I did say possibly I might not speak against the conference report if $75,000 were agreed upon. But I expressly told the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] that I reserved the right to vote against it, because from first to last, after a most thorough and careful investigation of the subject, I was convinced that the claim was a fraud, and I never would agree that the Government owed this man a dollar.

A claim pending before Congress is analogous to a private lawsuit, a suit between individuals in a court of justice, but with this difference: In a court of justice both the plaintiff and the defendant take active part in presenting or combating the claim. They hunt up their testimony; they see that the facts are brought out pro or con, in order that justice may be done. They have an attorney to represent them. But here in Congress, in addition to being judge and jury, we have through the Committee on Claims to act as our own defendant in getting the Government's side of the case as best we can. We have no attorney to see that justice is done to the Government. We have no record testimony furnished by the Government, and we have no witnesses except such as the members of Congress may have time to look up, or who may volunteer their testimony, and in many cases the witnesses live thousands of miles away. It is no short distance from here to Massachusetts.

There is a great defect in the manner in which claims are presented here. If a bill, or a petition rather, were required to be filed in the Federal district court where the claim arises by every claimant against the Government, and the local district attorney were made to join issue, after three or four weeks' notice, and get up the testimony for the Government, before a jury of the vicinage, whose verdict should be treated not as a judgment but merely as opinion of the merits of the claim, then require the whole record to be certified to Congress with the opinion of the judge and district attorney, then, in that event, we would have some data to proceed upon here. But what data have we on which to predicate our action for about nine-tenths of the claims that come before this body? What data have we in the present instance? Very little, except the ex parte statement of the claimant himself. I took a good deal of trouble to investigate this case, and reluctantly came to the conclusion that it was a fraud from the man's own papers as presented by the Secretary of War to the Forty-sixth Congress. Besides that, from the cross-examination I made of the claimant himself I became entirely satisfied that his claim had no equity.

But it has been said—has been alleged by the Speaker of this House on a former occasion—that the man Emery had carte blanche to make this dynamometer at whatever expense he might think necessary. I quote from the Speaker of the House in 1887:

If this were a mere case of contract to build a machine, the nature and limitations of which contract were well understood by both sides, there would be no reason on earth why the loss should not rest where it fell. But here is a contract to build a machine the like of which never existed on the face of the earth. That machine has been built by the inventor without the slightest regard to terms of the contract.

Why, Mr. Speaker, dynamometers are as common as any other machines. Every important machine-shop, every rolling-mill, and all contractors or engineers engaged in erecting buildings, or bridges, or other structures requiring the determination of the tensile, torsional, or crushing strength of materials have dynamometers. They are common; and this man Emery sought the contract himself to build one for this Government. He executed a bond for $35,000 to build the machine in five months; and when I first asserted on this floor in the early part of the session that he had given such a bond and entered into such a contract with the specifications it was questioned. But I have got the original papers here now before me. Here is the original bond executed by him, as well as the original contract embodying the specifications signed by him; so that the denial that such a bond and contract existed is all stuff. The Government had a good dynamometer, but it wanted a stronger one, and let this man build it, giving him his own time, and he piddled along at it for five years, and then set up a claim for $5,000 a year salary, and charged 7 per cent. compound interest to swell his charges.

But it is said for this man that he has constructed a most wonderful machine. Quoting from the Speaker again, he says that the machine will measure the resistance of a horse hair, or record the resistance of a 4-inch bar of iron.

Now, that proves too much. Who wants a dynamometer that can record the resistance that a horse hair offers to being broken? Who wants in a bridge or a house or gun-carriage or anything made out of wood, or metal, or stone so feeble as to amount only to the resistance of a horse hair? Besides that, if it records the resistance of a horse hair, as alleged, it would require a microscope of such power to note it that I doubt if there are half a dozen in the United States capable of measuring it. And even if it did, he obligates himself in this bond that the recording scale shall be much more sensitive and much more severely accurate than the famous Fairbanks scales. So if it does what is claimed, he bound himself to do it. But, as I said, this proves too much, not only because nobody cares about a dynamometer that will break a horse hair, nor is it requisite to break a bar of iron or steel 4 inches in diameter.

Before this dynamometer and some others of the same capacity were constructed they would break a little bar of steel or iron and then estimate by proportion what the strength would be of a larger bar. But the Speaker claims wonderful merit for this, because it can break a 4-inch bar of iron or steel. Do you not see at once that would take away all the profit of building the bars of a bridge or the iron girders for a house? Would a rolling-mill in Pittsburgh or farther West ship all these things to the Watertown arsenal to see whether they could stand the maximum strain or not? It would eat up all the profit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask two or three minutes more.

Mr. BYNUM. I can not spare three minutes. I will yield two minutes more.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish I had time to go into details. There is only one other point I want to present to the House, and it is with reference to the pretended equity of this man's claim for Government use of his patents in the machine. It is asserted here, and many gentlemen have voted for the claim upon the pretext, that the Government appropriated this man's patents. I assert that he never took out any patent between 1872 and 1882. I have traced his career from beginning to end through the Patent Office and have got all the details and memoranda here to prove that he never took out any patent while he was building this machine, nor did he take out any patent between 1872 and 1882.

There was one reissue of a patent for a hydraulic press. But a reissue is no new patent. That was merely issued to him to cover matter that he had omitted when he took out his patent in 1872, before he began to construct this machine. So it is untrue to say he has had patents appropriated by the Government that he invented while building the machine. He did take out some patents in 1882 and since that time for scales, which he has assigned to the Emery Scale Company. He also obtained a patent in 1872 for a hydraulic weighing machine, which, if he incorporated in the Watertown dynamometer, he obligated himself to do it. Hence, to sum up, Emery has merely executed a contract which he sought himself and which he gave a bond of $35,000 to execute. True we have got the opinion of army officers that he ought to be paid $200,000 for his "genius, fidelity, and services." That is all.

The real facts have not come out, and, as I said, if a jury of the district court of Massachusetts, where Watertown arsenal is situated, could pass upon this claim, this man would not get a dollar.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, this claimant contracted with the Government to construct this machine for $25,000. That contract was made in writing. The Government desired some changes, or asked that the machine be constructed of heavier material. He entered into a subsequent contract in writing to complete the machine in accordance with the wishes of the Government officials or the agents of the Government for $31,000. That contract was made in writing. A machine was constructed in accordance with the contracts entered into by the claimant and the agents of the Government, and the Government paid every dollar it ever agreed to pay to this claimant. Now, for ten years or more the claimant has been hanging around Congress, in the halls, and in the private apartments of the officials of this House, seeking this appropriation. It has passed the Senate for large amounts of time and again, and I have never known a claim so large that it did not get through the Senate at a very rapid gait.

A committee, however, was appointed in this House to investigate this claim thoroughly, and it is the only committee that ever did call before them the claimant and his witnesses and his vouchers. After making a thorough investigation of everything he could possibly present, they found that he had expended some $38,000 more than he had been paid. That was the only showing that he could possibly make to a committee that investigated this claim for months. In addition to that, in the Forty-ninth Congress a bill was passed, with the understanding at that time that the amount would be accepted by this claimant and no further claim made, giving him the $38,000, and $25,000 additional for his services, at the rate of $5,000 a year for five years. The conferees went out and brought in, just an hour before the Forty-ninth Congress expired, a report giving him $100,000, and that was put through this House under whip and spur, as it is attempted to put this report through. It went to the President of the United States, who refused to sign it.

Mr. FARQUHAR. But I would state to the gentleman that that was a Democratic House.

Mr. BYNUM. Oh, I am not here to say what the character of the House was, but the gentleman will find if he investigates that vote that the votes which carried that bill through were Republican votes, just as they are going to carry it through this time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I call attention to the fact that this claim has been pressed persistently, in and out of order. It was thrust in the face of this House by the Speaker while on the table, in violation of the rules of this House and when it ought to have gone to a committee and where other bills of a similar character were sent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYNUM. It is the only claim that has been pressed in that way and given such preference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] is recognized for ten minutes.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I disagree with my friend from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] very infrequently, and it always makes me go over the matter upon which I disagree with him to see whether I am not wrong. I have on this occasion done that work. I examined this claim with great care in the Forty-ninth Congress. I took the trouble to examine some of the original vouchers. It so happened that a friend, Governor Long, of Massachusetts, was greatly interested in this case, and I became interested because of certain statements he made, and I took the trouble, with considerable labor, precisely as if I had been a judge, to go over the claim, and came to the conclusion that the claimant ought to receive about $75,000 as a fair, honest, and just compensation, and I voted for that amount in the Forty-ninth Congress. I reluctantly voted for the compromise of the conferees for $100,000, feeling that it was better that he should receive $100,000 and let the matter end than that he should go without anything and the House be guilty of an act of injustice in denying an honest claim.

In the Fiftieth Congress the matter did not come up and I did not examine it; but in the Fifty-first Congress I moved that he be given $75,000, and on motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] an amendment was made striking out $75,000 and giving $50,000. I have as a conferee of the House again examined it, and have come to the conclusion again that he ought to receive $75,000; and in addition to that it would be just, if it could be done, that some compensation should be given to him for the delay of nearly five years since in 1886 I came to the conclusion he ought to receive the $75,000. I have not time in ten minutes to go over all the reasons for coming to the conclusion I have reached. It is based on a good many reasons; but the principal was that he agreed to build a certain instrument for the testing of iron and metal of a certain degree of strength, to do certain work under contract; that the machine would cost $25,000.

There was a subsequent contract for another machine invented by C. E. Emery, and not Albert H. Emery; and it was paid for, and is not a part of this controversy. That was a matter entirely distinct from the matter in controversy, and my friend, Mr. BYNUM, is mistaken in his belief that the second contract for $6,500 was for a change in the original machine. That plays no part in this controversy.

Mr. Emery, in conjunction with the engineers of the Army—and he himself is a man of remarkable genius—when the contract was being executed came to the conclusion that that particular machine would not do the particular work it was designed for, and with the consent of the Government, and under the officers of the Government, he changed that machine, and so changed it that with numerous inventions of the very highest skill he produced a machine very much more valuable, very much more costly than the machine which was described in the original contract. Now, that machine actually cost him money over and above what he has received—a sum nearly equal to $75,000.

Mr. BYNUM. I want to ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question. Is it not true that in the Forty-eighth Congress he brought every voucher he could bring before the committee, and all he could show was $38,000?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I was not in the Forty-eighth Congress and am not prepared to say.

Mr. BYNUM. Have you not read that report?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I have read the report, but I am not prepared to say what the testimony was upon which that report was based. I am speaking of my reading of these papers for myself.

Now, that machine, as it was originally to be constructed, was to be a machine of a certain kind and strength, and it was constructed by him when he knew he would lose upon it. He knew that he was not going to make money, and he was willing to lose money, because he was producing a machine the value of which could not be overestimated, and which, if it worked successfully, he could sell to other parties.

It was, therefore, a fair business transaction to build a machine at a loss; but the numerous and costly additions made the aggregate far more than he could or ought to be forced to bear, and for this loss he ought to be compensated. And as soon as it was built the Government of the United States, by an act of Congress, turned that machine, or its use, over to everybody, by which he was utterly unable to sell a similar machine to anybody else, so that it actually got his machine for $75,000 less than it cost him and destroyed his market for his machine. Now, I say that under all the circumstances it is a just but meager compensation.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, is the gentleman aware of any man who wants to test the strength of wood, metal, or stone, west of the Ohio, sending material to that machine to be tested?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. What I meant to say was—

Mr. TILLMAN. It is only of use to the neighborhood.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. What I meant to say was that in that part of the country, which up to this time is the greatest manufacturing part of the country, a place accessible by railroads, any one can send a piece of iron and have its strength tested by that machine. It will test the strength of material from the smallest wire to the largest piece of structural iron, so that for the building of a trestle or of a railroad bridge you send but one piece of the iron, if the bridge is to be built in Texas or is to be built in Massachusetts, and the exact strength necessary for that bridge, for the safety of human life, and for the transportation of the freight of America can be tested by that most marvelous and wonderful engine.

Mr. BYNUM. Now will the gentleman answer this question: When the test is made and the registered strength of one single piece of iron is ascertained, what is the necessity of ever sending another to be tested at all?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Undoubtedly if every piece of iron was made at the same furnace, at the same time, out of ore from the same mine, so that every piece would be an exact parallel to every other, there would be no such necessity. But, as every gentleman knows, iron is made by fluxing and mixing iron ores, and no two pieces of iron made out of different ores, at different times, and in different furnaces, are certain to be of exactly the same strength.

Mr. BYNUM. Does not the gentleman know that even different pieces of iron made at the same time are not always of the same strength, and that every piece has to be tested?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Undoubtedly you can not tell with certainty that two pieces of iron made at the same time and in the same furnace are of the same strength, but when the iron is made at different furnaces that greatly increases the uncertainty.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have given the general reasons. There was also a particular reason in connection with this conference. I was put upon the conference without my knowledge. I was opposed to allowing more than $75,000. An arrangement was made, as I saw from the report in the RECORD. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN], who has been a persistent opponent to this claim, and other gentlemen made an agreement with the friends of this claimant, worn out by his efforts to obtain payment of his claim, that $75,000 would be accepted.

That was what I thought ought to be done, and when I was put upon the conference committee I said frankly to the conferees on the part of the Senate that I felt I was not doing exactly right by them because I came
